JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

PATENTED 1862, 1868, 1871, 1875, & 1879, THROUGHOUT EUROPE & AMERICA.

"In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist."
"CH. GOUNOD."

"We, the undersigned, certify that after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the house of BRINSMEAD."
"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN."
"D. MAGNUS."
"CHEVALIER ANTOINE DE KONTSKI."

"Paris, September 8, 1878."

"The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics."
"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc."

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice.
For these symptoms use EPPS'S GLYCERINE JUJUBES. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled "James Epps and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—
"Gentlemen,—I may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after a extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice. In no case can they do any harm. Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

MR. FARLEY SINKINS writes: "Your Lozenges restore the voice when suffering from a cold far better than any Lozenges I know. I shall recommend them." BASKER'S UNI-VERSAL LOZENGES cure Coughs, Asthma, Bronchitis, Huskiness, Sore and Relaxed Throat, Croup, &c. Sold at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 6d., by all chemists, or post-free for 14 or 33 stamps at Basker, Pharmaceutical Chemist, Bridgewater. "They are now used by many of our most eminent vocalists."

NOTICE OF SALES FOR 1881.

MESSRS. KELLY and CO., in calling attention to the under-mentioned dates of Sales for the year 1881, believe that they are quite correct when they state that their Rooms, 14 and 16, Mortimer Street, London, W., are amongst the largest in London, having (besides numerous smaller ones) four rooms 100 feet long by 25 feet wide. In consequence of the increasing popularity of their Quarterly and Bi-Quarterly Sales, and to meet the wishes of their several Clients, they have decided to have Sales by Auction of MUSICAL PROPERTY EVERY MONTH during the ensuing year, the dates of which will be:—

January 5 Quarterly.	July 6 Quarterly.
February 9 Monthly.	August No Sale.
March 9 Monthly.	September 7 Monthly.
April 6 Quarterly.	October 5 Quarterly.
May 4 Monthly.	November 9 Monthly.
June 1 Monthly.	December 7 Monthly.

All Goods that Clients are desirous of having inserted in any of the above Sales must be delivered (or Messrs. Kelly and Co. will fetch them with their own vans) four clear days before the date of Sale, and descriptions sent in fourteen days in advance of the same. It will be seen by the above dates that each Sale takes place on a WEDNESDAY, and all accounts are settled on the FRIDAY following.

Messrs. Kelly and Co. take this opportunity of thanking their numerous Customers and the Public in general for the kind support they have given them during the last thirty years, and hope, by strictly attending to Business, to be favoured with a continuance of their patronage; and they desire to announce that they have always on hand a Large Stock of New and Second-hand Instruments (some 500), of all classes and by every known maker, to select from, at prices defying competition.

VALUATIONS OF MUSICAL PROPERTY effected in Town or Country, and outdoor Sales by Auction of Manufactured or Unmanufactured Stocks attended to on the most advantageous terms.

Particular care is paid to all goods sent in to warehouse, and they guarantee that instruments so warehoused shall be tuned and insured at the following (inclusive) low charges, viz., Grands and Squares, 7s. 6d., and Cottages, 5s. per month.

Please note the address, Messrs. KELLY and Co. (Manufacturers to Her Majesty, the Royal Family, and the late Imperial Family of France), Musical Auctioneers, and Pianoforte, Harp, Harmonium, and American Organ Dealers, Importers and Manufacturers, 14 and 16, Mortimer Street (lately styled Charles Street), and 26, and 27, Nassau Street, Cavendish Square, London, W.

Oh! wert thou in the frozen blast.
My heart is sair.
The Highland lassie.
The lovely lass of Inverness.
Phillis the fair.
Ye banks and braes.

Although my bed were in yon moor.
Thou hast left me ever, Jamie.
How can my heart be glad.
So far away.
My love is like a red, red rose.
My heart 's in the Highlands.

THE ONLY COMPLETE EDITION

CONTAINING BOOKS 7 and 8.

"The volume before us is, indeed, a model of cheapness combined with elegance and convenient arrangement. It contains, in 518 neatly printed pages, everything Mendelssohn has written for the pianoforte, from the Capriccio in F sharp minor, Op. 5, composed in 1825, at the age of 16, to his latest works, including several published after his death. . . . A student will find no end of interesting points in the works here collected, but to the more advanced amateur also they will be a source of purest enjoyment. We need not add that the stately volume before us is eminently adapted to serve as an elegant and valuable gift-book at this or, indeed, at any season of the year."—The Times.

"This is a new edition, just issued by the eminent firm in Berners Street, of the complete works of Mendelssohn for pianoforte solo, including the two concertos, and the other pieces with orchestral accompaniments. These are comprised in one handsome volume, full music size, far less bulky than might be expected from the comprehensiveness of its contents. These comprise all the hitherto published pianoforte works of the composer of the class just specified, including the eight books of 'Lieder ohne Worte.' Some of these and several other pieces are the copyrights of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., hence this is the only complete edition procurable in this country. The advantages of having all these productions of the great master in a single volume are great, especially for the purposes of ready reference, as in the case of the beautiful one-volume edition of Beethoven's Sonatas issued by the same publishers. Like it, the Mendelssohn collection now under notice is beautifully engraved and printed, and is altogether brought out in a style worthy of the contents and of the high reputation of the firm by which it is issued."—Illustrated London News.

. Each Student receives individual Instruction, and separate Classes are formed for Ladies in all subjects.

There are Three Terms in the Academic Year. LENT TERM
(1881) begins January 17, ends April 9. TRINITY TERM (1881) begins
May 2, ends July 23. MICHAELMAS TERM (1881) begins September 26, ends December 17.

The following prizes and medals are awarded amongst the Students of the College:—The Tallis Gold Medal, Silver and Bronze Medals for Students in Music, Composition Prizes for Musical Students, Silver and Bronze Medals for Students in Arts. Full particulars may be seen in the College Calendar for 1880-81.

The Classes and Lectures are intended as a preparation for the Public Examinations at the Universities, and for the Musical and Arts Examinations of the College.

The new College building is situate in Mandeville Place, Manchester Square (corner of Hinde Street), and is easily accessible from all parts of London, being within a few minutes' walk of Oxford Circus, and of the Baker Street Station of the Metropolitan Railway, which communicates with all the suburban lines.

All applications should be addressed to the Secretary, Trinity College, London, W.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

DR. B. W. RICHARDSON, F.R.S., will Lecture on January 20, on BREATH AND BREATHING.

Tickets for the single Lecture, Half-a-Crown; which, as well as prospectuses, may now be obtained from the Secretary.

PRACTICAL MUSICAL EXAMINATIONS.

Local Examinations in Instrumental and Vocal Music (Pianoforte, Organ, Violin, Solo-Singing, &c.) will be held in London, at various local centres, on MONDAY, January 17, 1881, and following days.

These Practical Musical Examinations were instituted by Trinity College, London, in 1878, and about 2,500 candidates have been separately examined in the above subjects.

The regulations may be had of any of the Hon. Local Secretaries, or of the Secretary, Trinity College, London, W.

MR. PEPYS THE MUSICIAN.

BY FRANCIS HUEFFER.

It is proposed in the present paper to consider our dear old friend Mr. Pepys in a somewhat new capacity. We all know him as the most delightful gossip that ever put pen to paper in this or any other language. The value of his information as regards manners, morals, and politics of the Restoration epoch is also generally acknowledged, and students of the history of the drama are apt to look with much leniency on his naïve admiration for Nell Gwyn and other frail heroines of the stage. His relations to the art of music, on the other hand, have hitherto been strangely disregarded, especially by musicians themselves. It is known in a general way that Pepys was fond of singing and playing on various instruments, also that he invented a new method of musical notation, which he, like all inventors of similar systems before and after, considered to be perfect. But as to the almost inexhaustible fund of valuable facts and dates relating to an important period of English musical history, that may be found in his pages, considerable ignorance seems to prevail, to judge at least by the all but total neglect with which the Diary has been treated by some of our latest historians of the art. It, therefore, may not be an altogether ungrateful task to point out the wealth of this mine of information. To work it thoroughly and systematically would require more leisure than I have, at present, at my disposal.

Music with Mr. Pepys was a passion, one amongst several it is true, but nevertheless all-engrossing at times. He loved it and he dreaded it. "Played on the viall," he writes, February 17, 1663, evidently after a long interval of virtuous abstention, "which I have not done this long time before upon any instrument, being fearful of being too much taken with musique for fear of returning to my old dotage thereon, and so neglect my business as I used to do."

Never was vow more seriously meant and more frequently broken. Here is another specimen of remorseful confession, as quaint and as "like human nature" as, perhaps, only Mr. Pepys could have penned. This time the entry is dated March 9, '66, and the reader will perceive that the moral progress made during the three intervening years was of the slenderest description. "Mrs. Knipp coming," he writes, "we spent the noon together very merry. She and I singing, and God forgive me! I do still see that my nature is not to be quite conquered, but will esteem pleasure of all things; though yet in the middle of it, it has reluctance after my business, which is neglected by my following my pleasure. However, musique and women I cannot but give way to, whatever my business is." "Wine," Mr. Pepys might have justly added to complete Luther's celebrated triad of "Wein, Weib und Gesang," to which he also was unflinchingly attached. It must, however, by no means be thought that to him the art was merely the solace of a leisure hour, or a welcome protest for a quiet flirtation. Music, as I said before, was his passion. Under its influence the innermost fibres of his heart were shaken to harmonious vibrations. It acted on him even with physical force, and to this influence he confesses with a naïve simplicity which belongs to his age no less than to his individuality. What clerk to the Admiralty would nowadays venture to commit, even to the most secret pages of his diary, such a passage as the following:—

"Feb. 27, 1668. With my wife to the King's House to see 'The Virgin Martyr,'* the first time it hath been acted a great while, and it is mighty pleasant; not that the play is worth much, but it is finely acted by Beck Marshall. But that which did please me beyond anything in the whole world was the wind musique when the angel comes down; which it is so sweet that it ravished me, and indeed, in a word, did wrap up my soul so that it made me really sick, just as I have formerly been when in love with my wife; that neither then nor all the evening, going home nor at home, I was able to think of anything, but remained all night transported, so as I could not believe that ever any musique hath that real command over the soul of a man as this did upon me; and makes me resolve to practice wind musique, and to make my wife do the like."

The passage is strikingly illustrative of the man's nature; a curious mixture of unsophisticated, not to say coarse, realism and of the most refined sensibility to the beauties of art and literature. For, be it said parenthetically, that in literature also Mr. Pepys was a sound judge of genuine merit, who, to name but one instance, in an age of studied politeness was able to appreciate the racy force of the old popular ballads of England and Scotland. It was, indeed, on his extensive collection of such treasures that Bishop Percy drew when he published his famous "Reliques," and thus prepared a healthy revolution in English literature against the stiltedness and pompousness of eighteenth century poets.

But, to return to our immediate subject, Mr. Pepys was not only an enthusiastic amateur of the ordinary kind. The collector's turn, developed in him to a degree little short of genius, stood him in good stead in musical as in other matters; and with it he combined that marvellous sense of order which enabled him to put some system into the disgracefully muddled navy accounts of Charles II.'s reign. The impression of perfect order and neatness is forcibly conveyed to one's mind as one enters the room of Magdalen College, Cambridge, where the Pepysian collection is kept. Here the cases are filled with rows of ancient tomes solidly bound and carefully arranged; and so as to make reference to each volume a matter of perfect ease, Mr. Pepys has catalogued, and at a later period recatalogued, his books and music; the different entries being distinguished by the colours of the ink. On the tables there are various curious-looking instruments, some evidently of a musical kind, the nature and uses of which a better mechanical genius than the present writer can boast of might perhaps still discover. Here also is the most precious of Mr. Pepys' treasures, his Diary, containing over three thousand pages, carefully written in Rich's system of shorthand, and extending over the first ten years of the Restoration, from January, 1660, to May 31, 1670. On that day the Diary closes for the melancholy reason which Mr. Pepys had better state in his own words:—

"Had another meeting with the Duke of York at Whitehall on yesterday's work, and made a good advance, and so being called by my wife, we to the Park, Mary Batelier and a Dutch gentleman, a friend of hers, being with us. Thence to 'The World's End,' a drinking-house by the Park, and there merry, and so home late. And thus ends all that I doubt I shall ever be able to do with my own eyes in the keeping of my Journal, I being not able to do it any longer, having done now so long as to undo my eyes almost every time that I take my pen in hand; and therefore whatever comes of it I must forbear; and therefore resolve from this time forward to have it kept by my people in long-hand, and must be contented to set down no more than is fit for them and all the world to know, or if there be anything, I must endeavour to keep a margin in my book open to add here and there a note in short-hand with my own hand. And so I betake myself to that course, which is almost as much as to see myself go into my grave, for which, and all the discomforts that will accompany my being blind, the good God prepare me!"

* Massinger's tragedy of that name.

In spite of the ominous name of the drinking-house and the lugubrious tone of the entry, the "world's end" had not yet come for Mr. Pepys. From a humble retainer of the Earl of Sandwich he rose by his own industry and integrity to be Secretary of the Admiralty and one of the Barons of the Cinque Ports, in which capacity he assisted at the coronation of James II. Although at heart a sincere admirer of Cromwell's genius, he was by political opinions and bent of mind a Royalist, and the last two Stuarts held him in high honour. It is said that James was sitting to Sir Godfrey Kneller for a portrait intended as a present to Mr. Pepys, when the news of William's landing in England reached Whitehall. The Revolution deprived Mr. Pepys of his office, but his busy mind found congenial occupation nevertheless. He continued his collections, dabbled in science, and lived to be President of the Royal Society. Neither did he lose that keen eyesight of his, although, unfortunately for us, he was never again able to commit his thoughts and observations, and little peccadilloes, to that trusty confidant of many years, his Diary.

To that Diary we must now refer for the immediate purpose of this article, such reference being fortunately made possible by the careful and, as far as the nature of the materials would allow, complete edition which the Rev. Mynors Bright has recently published. Looking at these volumes, one is almost embarrassed by the wealth of valuable historic fact and amusing anecdote which they offer to the musical historian. One does not know where to commence—where to stop. As a beginning, however, has to be made, it will be best, before coming to personal matters, to look for such information on the general state of music in England as Mr. Pepys vouchsafes. Here we meet at once with a complaint which most likely had been made long before the seventeenth century, and will no doubt be made in the twentieth, the neglect of English music in favour of the foreign article. The old saying of the prophet, despised in his own country, applies to the musician perhaps more than to any other public man—painter, poet, statesman, or preacher; and it is somewhat comforting to find that some of the leading musical nations in the world showed at first the same disbelief in their own art-production of which English musicians so justly complain at present. More especially the upper classes seem everywhere determined to ignore as long as possible any independent movement in the music of their own country. The battle of French music was fought in the Paris of the ancien régime by two foreigners—Lulli, an Italian, and Gluck, a German; and perhaps the latter would never have had his operas accepted but for the protection of the royal lady who had been his pupil as the Archduchess Marie-Antoinette. In the struggle between French and Italian music, Rousseau, an aristocrat in taste, although the founder of modern democracy, ardently espoused the cause of the latter. He demonstrated that French music not only did not exist, but never by any chance could exist, the language itself being wholly unfit for the purposes of the singer. "Le chant françois," he winds up his violent diatribe, "n'est qu'un aboyement continuel, insupportable à toute oreille non prévenue; l'harmonie en est brute, sans expression et sentant uniquement son remplissage d'écolier, les airs françois ne sont point des airs, le récitatif françois n'est point du récitatif." A similar contempt of national music, although never expressed with equal force of language, runs through the history of the rise of the art in Germany. The petty princes had each their court theatre and their court concert, at which Italian singers sang Italian airs, accompanied by French or Italian instrumentalists; the native element, if tolerated at all, being looked at with more or less open contempt. How Mozart, how even Weber, had to suffer from this condition of things is too well known; and it was not till the voice of the people became supreme in matters of art that the great German composers gained the acknowledgment justly due to them.

Under such circumstances it is not a matter for surprise that in the early days of the Restoration, English music was not the art the king delighted to honour. Charles II., when he came to his own again, was to all intents and purposes a foreigner. His tastes, his politics, his vices, and even his virtues and graces were foreign. Moreover, he had that dangerous "little knowledge" of music which enabled him to beat the time correctly during the anthem at church, and to find unreasonable fault with imperfections too fully accounted for by the circumstances. No wonder, therefore, that he seems to have taken an actual delight in humbling English musicians at the expense of their foreign competitors. One of the earliest entries in the Diary (October 14, 1660) refers to a visit of Mr. Pepys to Whitehall Chapel, "where one Dr. Croft made an indifferent sermon, and after it an anthem, ill sung, which made the king laugh." Neither did profane music find favour with Charles II. For a little more than a month after the last entry (November 20) we find that "at a play the king did put a great affront upon Singleton's musique in bidding them stop, and made the French musique play, which, my Lord (Sandwich) says, do much outdo all ours." That the example set by the Court and followed in other classes of society was countenanced by the English musicians returning from abroad, and that Mr. Pepys had sense enough to have his own opinions on the subject is proved by the following extract dated six years after those last quoted:—

"June 18, 1666. To my Lord Bellasis, by invitation; . . . and at dinner there played to us a young boy, lately come from France where he had been learning a year or two on the viallin, and plays finely. But impartially I do not find any goodnesse in their ayres (though very good) beyond ours, when played by the same; I observed in several of Baptiste's (the great composer) and our Bannister's. But it was pretty to see my Lord's daughter loves musique the most that I ever saw creature in my life."

The "Bannister," whom Pepys here compares with Lulli—for he evidently is meant by Baptiste—is the John Banister, well known in the history of English art as the composer of "Choice Ayres and Songs," and the incidental music to several "masques," tragedies, and plays, including Shakespeare's "Tempest." He was, in 1663, appointed first violin to the king, which post he is said to have lost owing to his upholding, within the hearing of His Majesty, the superiority of English over French players. A few months after the above entry, Pepys mentions a rumour that "the king's viallin, Bannister, is mad; that the king hath a Frenchman come to be chief of some part of the king's musique." Fortunately the first part of this information taken in its literal meaning proved incorrect, or, if true, Bannister must soon have recovered from his insanity, for he lived to start successful concerts in London, "over against the George Tavern, in Whitefriars," and died in 1679, at the age of forty-nine, leaving a son the inheritor of his name and his talent.

There were, it is true, many things to drive a King's fiddler out of his senses in the time of the Merry Monarch, who had not even the good grace to pay his musicians after having insulted them. In a private chat "of the King's family with Mr. Hingston the organist (December 19, 1666)," Mr. Pepys ascertained that "many of the musique are ready to starve, they being five years behindhand for their wages; nay, Evans, the famous man upon the harp, having not his equal in the world, did the other day die for mere want, and was fain to be buried at the almshouse of the parish, and carried to his grave in the dark at night without one link, and that Mr. Hingston met it by chance, and did give 12d. to buy two or three linkes." On the other hand Tom Killigrew could boast that "he hath gathered our Italians from several courts in Christendom for the King, which he do give 200*l.* a-year a-piece to," an amount which, considering the value of money in those days, would not be despised by many modern players.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. IX.—SCHUBERT.

No one acquainted with the facts of Schubert's life is surprised to find that his extant letters—those at least which have been published—are comparatively few in number and unimportant in character, save for the light they throw upon his individuality. He, poor man, was scarcely known outside the walls of Vienna, and had no correspondents among the great, the learned, or the simply curious in distant places and lands; while, within the limits of his native city, he was far too much engaged in the hard struggle of life, or in obeying his wonderful impulse towards artistic creation, for the work of a mere epistolar. Yet such letters of Schubert's as have reached us are by no means to be despised—no scrap of paper ever is, to which a great man confides his thoughts; and in going through them we shall gather some idea, at least, of the man by whose genius all lovers of music set such store.

The series begins characteristically enough, having regard to the master's sad experience of life, with a note addressed by Schubert to his brother, while yet he was a boy-scholar at the Konvikt. The authorities of this educational establishment appear to have been somewhat of the mind of Dickens' Yorkshire school-master concerning the amount of food on which a growing boy can be profitably supported. At any rate, he did not get enough to eat, and the nature within him cried aloud for more. Hence the pitiful letter we are about to quote:—

"I'll come to the point at once, and unburden my heart's secrets, and not detain you by beating about the bush, or circuitous talk. I've been thinking a good long time about my position, and found that it's very well on the whole, but that in some respects it might be improved. You know from experience that one can often enjoy eating a roll and an apple or two, and all the more when one must wait eight hours and a half after a poor dinner for a meagre supper. This wish has haunted me so often and so perseveringly that at last, volens volens, I must make a change. The few groschen my father gave me are all gone to the devil: what am I to do the rest of the time? 'They that hope in Thee shall not be ashamed!' (Matt. ii. 4.) So I thought. Supposing you advance me monthly a few kreutzers. You would never miss it, whilst I should shut myself up in my cell and be quite happy. As I said, I rely on the words of the Apostle Matthew, who says, 'Let him that hath two coats give one to the poor.' Meanwhile, I trust that you will listen to the voice that unceasingly appeals to you to remember your loving, hoping, poverty-stricken—and once again I repeat poverty-stricken—brother."

The pathos of this appeal must be felt by all, since none can miss seeing that it is no ordinary schoolboy request for pence. Why did Schubert "beat about the bush," as he seems to have done before making up his mind to come to the point? Did he distrust his brother's willingness to help, or was it pride that called for so severe a struggle? We shall be able to answer the question in the light of further study. Meanwhile, the poor boy quoting the promises and injunctions of Scripture, in order to draw a few kreutzers from a brother's pocket, is about as touching an incident as biography can show.

Four years later Schubert began keeping a diary. He may, indeed, have done so earlier, but nothing written before 1816 survives. For this, probably, we have to thank a certain autograph collector in Vienna, who appears to have obtained possession of the entire MSS., and then sold it or gave it away page by page, till Fuchs, accidentally discovering what was left, secured it. Even the remnant is a treasure. Like most gushing young people who keep diaries, Schubert poured his whole soul into his book, and rhapsodised often mistily, but always earnestly, giving us to see the actual man. Here is the first entry:—

"June 13, 1816. This day will haunt me for the rest of my life, as a bright, clear, and lovely one. Gently, and as from a distance, the magic tones of Mozart's music sound in my ears. With what alternate force and tenderness, with what masterly power did Schlesinger's playing of that music impress it deep, deep in my heart! Thus do these sweet impressions, passing into our souls, work beneficently on our inmost being, and no time, no change of circumstance, can obliterate them. In the darkness of this life they show a light, a clear beautiful distance, from which we gather confidence and hope. O Mozart, immortal Mozart! how many and what countless images of a brighter, better world hast thou stamped upon our souls! This quintet may be called one of the greatest among his smaller works. I, too, was moved on this occasion to introduce myself. I played variations by Beethoven, sang Goethe's 'Rastlose Liebe' and Schiller's 'Amalia.' The first met with universal, the second with qualified applause. Although I myself think my 'Rastlose Liebe' more successful than 'Amalia,' yet I cannot deny that to Goethe's genius must be attributed in large measure the applause which greeted the song."

We are bound to admit that Schubert's reflections on the power of music are neither new nor profound. But they serve to show how deeply he had been moved by a quintet of Mozart's at a time when Beethoven, in the full splendour of his genius, was writing works of a character far excelling those of Mozart in the very qualities which distinguish the compositions of Schubert. We all know that Beethoven's influence over his young fellow-townsmen increased as years went on; but in 1816, if there be any truth in Schubert's rhapsody, Mozart was his idol.

On June 14, 1816, the youthful musician wrote:—

"After the lapse of a few months, I took once more an evening walk. There can hardly be anything more delightful than, of an evening, after a hot summer's day, to stroll about on the green grass. The meadows between Währing and Döbling seem to have been made for this purpose. I felt so peaceful and happy as my brother Carl and I walked together in the struggling twilight. 'How lovely!' I thought and exclaimed, and then stood still enchanted. The neighbourhood of the churchyard reminded us of our excellent mother. Whiling away the time with melancholy talk, we arrived at the point where the Döbling road branches off, and I heard a well-known voice issuing as though from heaven, which is our home. The voice came from a carriage, which was pulled up. I looked up, and there was Herr Weinmüller, who got out and greeted us with his hearty, manly, cheerful-toned voice. How vainly does many a man strive to show the candour and honesty of his mind by conversation equally sincere and candid! how would many a man be the laughing-stock of his fellow-creatures were he to make the effort! Such gifts must come naturally; no efforts can acquire them."

This entry cannot fail to reward examination. In the first place it proves—what, indeed, required no proof—that Schubert, himself a creator of the beautiful, was in sympathy with every manifestation of the spirit of beauty. The peace and happiness that came upon him, as so often to Beethoven, amid the sights and sounds of rural life, are no less indicative of this feeling than the general tone of the extract is suggestive of sentiment tending towards the morbid. But the most curious subject for thought may be found in the reflections evidently called forth by the hearty, manly, cheerful-toned voice, and, no doubt, corresponding bearing of Weinmüller. It seems as though Schubert, in presence of his cheery friend, felt conscious of lacking that which he could admire and enjoy in others. Hence, he would naturally ask himself, "Why cannot I be like this man, who dispenses light and life wherever he goes?" And then, as naturally, would follow the conclusion, "Such gifts must be given; no efforts can acquire them."

On June 16, Schubert attended a jubilee festival in honour of Salieri, and, on reaching home again, confided to his diary some remarks, which go far to prove that his sympathies were on the side of artistic conservatism. A bizarre element was working in the music of that day, just as in that of our own time, and the master here shows us how, had he been a musical critic, he would have fought against giving applause to extravagances and innovations, simply because in the long run of history a proportion of changes have actually been steps in advance. Here are Schubert's words:—

"It must be pleasant and invigorating to the artist to see all his pupils collected around him, every one striving to do his best in honour of his master's jubilee fête; to hear in all their compositions a simple, natural expression, free from that bizarrierie which, with the majority of composers of our time, is the prevailing element, and for which we are almost mainly indebted to one of our greatest German artists: free, I say, from that bizarrierie which links the tragic with the comic; the agreeable with the odious; the heroic with the miserable; the most sacred subjects with buffoonery—all this without discrimination; so that men become mad and frantic instead of being dissolved in tears, and tickled to idiotic laughter, rather than elevated towards God. The fact that this miserable bizarrierie has been proscribed and exiled from the circle of his pupils, so that their eyes may rest on pure holy nature, must be a source of the liveliest pleasure to the artist who, with Gluck for his pioneer, has learned to know nature, and has clung to her in spite of the most unnatural influences of our day."

The tendency of these remarks is clear, and whoever may have been aimed at in the reference to "one of our greatest German artists," the fact is demonstrated that the "Zukunft" of 1816 could not number Franz Schubert among its votaries.

Following the notice of Salieri's fête comes a series of reflections or aphorisms, which have a curious interest, especially if, from their vagueness and sometimes cloudiness, we may argue a correspondingly indefinite thought. In one case, he says:—

"Man is like a ball between chance and passion. I have often heard it said by writers, 'the world is like a stage, where every man plays his part. Praise and blame follow in the other world!' Still, every man has one part assigned him—we have had our part given us—and who can say if he has played it well or ill? He is a bad theatrical manager who distributes among his players parts they are not qualified to act. Carelessness here is not to be thought of. The world has no example of an actor being dismissed because of his bad declamation. As soon as he has a part adapted to his powers he will play it well enough. Whether he is applauded or not depends on a public with its thousand caprices. In the other world praise or blame depends on the Grand Manager. Blame, therefore, is balanced."

Schubert may, here, have had himself in view. The "Grand Manager" had given him the rôle of a composer, and he neither could nor did play it badly. Yet there was no applause. Never mind. In the other world blame and praise are weighed out in scales that cannot err. The master goes on:—

"Natural disposition and education determine the bent of man's heart and understanding. The heart is ruler; the mind should be." Here he adds what reads like a quotation from some one's book on proverbial philosophy: "Take men as they are, not as they ought to be."

From this, the writer—who had some experience of love, and cherished aspirations towards marriage—turns aside for the purpose of indulging in remarks that, the key being lacking, read like extravagant rant.

"Happy is he who finds a true friend! Happier still is he who finds in his own wife a true friend! It is now-a-days a troublesome thought that of those who regard marriage, some invest it with sadness; others with gross sensuality. Monarchs of our day, you see this and keep silence! Or do ye not see it? Then, O God, throw a veil over our senses and steep our feelings in Lethe. Yet once, I pray, draw back the veil."

It is open to doubt whether the question to the "Monarchs of the earth" forms a sequel to the reflections on marriage. These entries, we should remember, were not intended for any one's eye, and, as a French biographer of Schubert acutely remarks, they are but answers to questions Schubert had put to himself—answers, the significance of which must remain hidden since we can never know what called them forth. The master goes on:—

"Man bears misfortune uncomplainingly, and, for that reason feels it all the more acutely. For what purpose did God create in us these keen sympathies?"

"Light spirit, light heart," they say. The too light heart most often conceals a too heavy heart."

"The opposite of human freedom is really the conventionality of city life. The necessity of observing this conventionality constitutes the happiness of fools, and the torment of sensible men."

"Now I know nothing more! To-morrow I am sure to know something fresh. Whence comes this? Is my understanding to-day duller than it will be to-morrow? Is it because I am full and sleepy? Why doesn't my mind think when my body sleeps? I suppose it goes for a walk. Certainly, it can't sleep!

"Odd questions!
I hear every one saying.
We can't venture here on an answer;
We must bear it all patiently.
Now good night,
Until ye awake."

It would be useless attempting the exaltation of Schubert to a place among philosophers on the strength of these outpourings. We have quoted his remarks, not for their value as ideas about men and things, but because they show in him both a sensitive and reflective mind. He seems to have got bewildered at the contrast between the light that shone for him upon music, and the darkness of all the world beside. Hence, when outside the limits of music, so much vagueness of thought, so much groping for a clue.

Readers of musical history do not need telling that the advent of Rossini's music in the Austrian capital excited no little ill-feeling. Enthusiastically applauded by the many, the "Swan of Pesaro" was scouted by the few, who either held his style in abhorrence as destructive of genuine taste, or envied his brilliant career. Schubert had personal reasons for ranging himself among the Italian composer's enemies, since the Rossinian fever removed to a greater distance than ever a possibility of his operas gaining the stage. But the Viennese musician was too magnanimous for any such mean conduct as this. The opinion of the "set" to which he belonged could not restrain his sympathies, nor did he ever shrink from owning his admiration for Rossini, or from avowing that he owed much to study of that master's delicate instrumentation. In one of his letters written at this period he says:—

"A short time since we had Rossini's 'Othello' . . . This opera is far better—I mean by that more characteristic—than 'Tancredi'! One cannot refuse to call Rossini a rare genius. His instrumentation is often original in the highest degree, and so is the voice-writing; and I can find no fault with the music, if I except the usual Italian gallopades and several reminiscences of 'Tancredi'!"

Like most highly strung and sensitive natures, Schubert was easily exalted and as easily depressed. Under the influence of stimulants, from some of which he might wisely have abstained, he could be the life and soul of a merry company, but the natural bent of his disposition was towards melancholy, and it was in him at times to be very melancholy indeed. Take, as an example, the subjoined letter to his friend Kupelweiser:—

" . . . At last I can once more pour out my heart to somebody. You are so good, so honest, and true, you will surely forgive me much which others would take great offence at. In one word, I feel myself the most unhappy, the most miserable man on earth. Picture to yourself a man whose health can never be re-established, who from sheer despair makes matters worse instead of better; picture to yourself, I say, a man whose most brilliant hopes have come to nothing, to whom the happiness of proffered love and friendship is but anguish, whose enthusiasm for the beautiful (an inspired feeling at least) threatens to vanish altogether, and then ask yourself if such a condition does not represent a miserable and unhappy man.

"Meine Ruh' ist hin, mein Herz ist schwer;
Ich finde sie nimmer und nimmermehr."

I can repeat these lines now every day; for every night when I go to sleep I hope never again to awake, and every morning renews afresh the wounds of yesterday. Friendlessly, joylessly, should I drag on my existence, were it not that sometimes my brain reels, and a gleam of the sweet days that are gone shoots across my vision. Our society (a reading society), as you will have known by this time, came to an end, from the reinforcement of the coarse crew addicted to beer-drinking and sausage-eating; its dissolution followed in two days, although I gave up attending immediately after departure. Leidersdorf, with whom I am intimately acquainted, is a thoroughly sound, good man, but so deeply depressed and melancholy that I fear I have gained from him more than is good for me."

Whatever the cause, one deep-seated in Schubert's nature, or the contagion of Leidersdorf's sadness, the foregoing is a cry de profundis—an exceeding great and bitter cry from a despairing heart. And who can wonder? This gifted man must have been profoundly conscious of the disparity between his genius and his apparent fate: the one glorious, the other obscure: the one rich, the other penniless: the one fitted to adorn the world, the other scarcely within the world's ken. Surely it was in the natural order of things, Schubert being constituted as we know him, that he should feel himself "the most unhappy, the most miserable man on earth." To the evidence of his letter we may add that of his diary. One day he writes:—

"Grief sharpens the understanding and strengthens the soul, whereas joy seldom troubles itself about the former, and makes the latter either effeminate or frivolous."

Here the philosopher speaks as one who would derive all the comfort possible from circumstances. He continues:—

"From the very depths of my heart do I hate the narrow, one-sided view of things which makes so many wretched people believe that what they pursue, and that alone, is the best, and that everything above or beyond it is worth nothing. One beauty should accompany a man throughout his whole life—that is true—and yet the flash of this enthusiasm should illuminate all else beside."

Another day he goes on in the same brooding strain:—

"No one fathoms another's grief; no one another's joy. People think they are ever going to one another, and they only go near one another. Oh! the misery of him who knows this by experience. My productions in music are the product of the understanding, and spring from my sorrow; those only, which are the product of pain, seem to please the great world most."

Yet, while writing these sad thoughts, he could turn aside for the sake of others purely abstract, such as:—

"The loftiest inspiration is but a step removed from the absolutely ludicrous, just as the deepest wisdom is near akin to crass stupidity."

"With faith man steps forth into the world. Faith is far ahead of understanding and knowledge; for to understand anything I must first of all believe something. It is the basis on which the weak understanding rears its first columns of proof; reason is nothing but faith analysed."

"O fancy! thou unsearchable fountain from which artists and philosophers quench their thirst! O stay with us, though known and honoured by few; stay with us, if only to guard us against that so-called enlightenment, that skeleton without flesh and blood."

A little later (1824) Schubert visited Zelesz with the family of Prince Esterhazy, and seems to have derived much benefit from the change of scene and variety of circumstance. From a letter written at this time to his brother Ferdinand it is evident that if not absolutely cheerful, he was more composed. The master's words show, moreover, how closely he clung to human sympathy amid the troubles of a lot that, at the best, must have been hard to bear. Referring to some loving expressions from Ferdinand he says:—

"What I value most of all is your recollection of me. Was it merely sorrow at my absence that drew tears from you, which you could not trust yourself to write about? Or on thinking about me, oppressed as I am by indefinable longings, did you feel yourself enveloped with a gloomy veil of sorrow? Or did all the tears which you have seen me shed come to your remembrance? For come what may I feel more than ever at this moment that you and none else are my own precious friend, interwoven with every fibre of my soul. In order that these lines may not perchance mislead you to a belief that I am unwell or out of spirits, I hasten to assure you of the contrary. Certainly that happy joyous time has gone when every object seemed encircled with a halo of youthful glory, and that which has followed is an experience of miserable reality which I endeavour as far as possible to embellish by the gifts of my fancy (for which I thank God). People are wont to think that happiness depends on the place which witnessed our former joys, whilst in reality it only depends on ourselves; and thus I learned a sad delusion, and saw a renewal of those experiences I had already gone through at Steyr, and yet I am now much more than formerly in the way of finding peace and happiness in myself."

Like all Schubert's utterances made towards the close of his life, the foregoing shows what a struggle went on within his soul, and how the "miserable realities" of which he spoke, by their contrast with the golden fancies of youth, poisoned his whole existence. But through this furnace of affliction genius has often to go. When we wish a bird to sing his best we darken his cage. So was it with the providential ordering of this sweet singer's life. He had to dwell in shadows, and we who come after him reap the benefit in the deathless strains inspired by suffering.

THE FATHER OF THE SYMPHONY.

By L. NOHL.

It is scarcely necessary to remind the reader that only by a consummate mastery over the technical part of his art, and especially by his knowledge of counterpoint, was our composer enabled to impart the playful humour to the thematic elaboration of his compositions at the early period to which we refer. "I was writing diligently, but scarcely solidly enough," he says, alluding to about the year 1753, "until at last I had the good fortune to acquire, under the tuition of Signor Porpora, who was then at Vienna, the knowledge of the true foundations of musical composition." Porpora was a representative of the then dominant Neapolitan school of opera, the leading characteristics of which consisted in the charm of its melodies and the transparent lucidity of its harmonisation. Under his influence Haydn, who was wont to accompany the great singing-master in the daily exercise of his vocation, acquired not only a truly melodious style, but also purity of harmonic progressions, and, above all, a nobility of outline as regards form, the instinctive appreciation for which was then still the prerogative of the Romanic race, the inheritor of ancient classical traditions. In this latter respect, too, Haydn at once superseded all his contemporaries, not even excepting Ph. E. Bach, and imparted to German music the same characteristic element which had hitherto been almost monopolised by the Italians. In order, however, to infuse depth of meaning into this acquired outline, he had recourse to that wealth of German harmonic art which was already at his disposal. Thus, Fux's "Gradus ad Parnassum," which he himself described as a "classical" work, rendered him great service; and with the utmost assiduity he applied himself to the study of this author's theoretical teachings. The works of Mattheson, Marpurg, and other theorists were likewise eagerly read by him, and it was thus that he at length commanded that ever-ready theoretical knowledge which distinguished Haydn from the rest of his contemporary composers of symphony, and which caused his productions in this particular sphere to become models for all time. There was, indeed, already about the middle of last century no lack of symphonic writers. In Italy, Sammartini, the instructor of Gluck, had imparted greater freedom of form to the operatic Sinfonia. In the year 1766 we find in Hiller's "Wöchentliche Nachrichten" the names of eight German composers of symphonies enumerated, besides that of Joseph Haydn, and amongst them the latter's countryman and friend, Dittersdorf. Ph. E. Bach, Jomelli, Gluck, Hasse, Graun, the brothers Benda, had all of them written compositions of this class, mostly indeed in sets of six, which fact may serve as a measure for the average extension of the numbers. Again, in a reference-book published by Breitkopf, of Leipzig, no less than fifty composers are named, up to the year 1762, under the head of "Symphony."

Haydn wrote his first symphony in the year 1759, after he had mastered the form, as such, in Ph. E. Bach's sonatas, transferring it, moreover, as we have seen, to the string quartet. The work is composed for string instruments, two oboes and two horns, in accordance with the capacity of the orchestra of Count Morzin, whose director he then was. Its leading key is D, and it consists of three short movements: Presto, Andante, and the final Presto. Here already the dual character of which we have spoken is apparent in every movement. The opening Presto contains three distinct themes, although but little attempt is as yet made in the direction of thematic development, traces of which occur chiefly in the Andante, while the entire work is distinguished by its symmetrical structure. In his second symphony, in C major, written some few years later, when he had become Capellmeister to Prince Esterhazy, some appreciation of the true significance of the new art-form appears to have already dawned upon our composer. It is entitled "Le Midi," and is divided into five movements, one of them of an incidental character, consisting of a "Recitativo" for violin with accompaniment, which succeeds the opening Allegro, and with which the composer probably intended to introduce a newly acquired first violinist to the princely orchestra. In addition to the instruments forming the score of the first symphony, this second work employs flutes, bassoons, and violoncos. The first Allegro is here ushered in by a short Larghetto, and commences with a vigorous unisono of all the instruments, followed by a second theme, numerous motivi and phrases, mostly serving for the display of skill of individual instrumentalists. The second part of the Allegro begins in the dominant with a new theme with which the motivi of the first part alternate, leading through various modulations to the orthodox repetition of the latter. The entire movement is of more ambitious structure than the corresponding one of the earlier work, and we can discern in it already the man under whose hands the orchestra was to become a powerfully speaking body. The character of the now following "Recitativo" we have already indicated, the second movement proper being, in fact, the Adagio which is succeeded by a Minuet. A few observations concerning the history of the introduction into the symphonic art-form of the Adagio and the Minuet will now be necessary. The several movements of which modern symphony is composed, as they undoubtedly had their origin in the three divisions comprising the early Sinfonia of the Italians, point at the same time to a relationship with a musical combination so much in vogue during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, to the so-called Suite or Partita; a series of dance-movements united outwardly by an identity of key. These Suites were frequently preceded by an overture of the type established by Lulli, commencing with a pathetic Adagio of characteristic rhythm leading to an Allegro, and concluding with a repetition of the opening movement. Subsequently, however, this repetition was omitted, and thus we have again an equivalent, as regards form, to the first movement of our Sonata, Adagio and Allegro, which latter moreover shares the contrapuntal treatment in common with the old overture. The Suite itself usually consisted of the aristocratic Allemande, the Spanish Sarabande, the French Gigue or the Minuet, to which was frequently added an Italian Aria or simple melody. This melody, which in opera was called Cavatina, also formed the original central or second movement of Italian Sinfonia, from which it was subsequently transferred to the Sonata-form. With the development and extended artistic sphere of the latter, this specifically melodious movement was likewise enriched by a number of themes speaking frequently the language of pathos. Thus, the Cantabile mesto in Ph. E. Bach's Sonata in D minor of the third series of "Clavier-sonaten, nebst einigen Rondos" (Leipzig, 1781) reminds us in this respect not only of Haydn's adagios, but also of some of the most deeply felt passages in "Die Zauberflöte," thereby explaining, in a measure, Mozart's words regarding this composer, "He was the father, we are only the boys." Nothing, however, is more truly the product of the German individual nature than this Adagio of the Sonata, and it required the unfolding of the entire depth of this national individuality in order to render the movement in question, least susceptible of variation as it would seem to be, the most impressive of the modern symphony. For its original structure was so unassuming that mastery over technical details, however complete, would be of no avail; all would be barren and desolate unless filled with the pulsations of the heart of a true artist. The Adagios of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven's symphonies may thus be unhesitatingly ranked with the most beautiful productions not of musical art only, but of all art, and Haydn was here again the originator. The experiences of his life had been conducive to that deepening of feelings and inner consciousness from which creative genius derives its noblest inspirations. His heart had been sorely tried when the woman he loved elected to bury her young life within the precincts of a cloister. Nor did the fact of his subsequently marrying her elder sister bring the desired comfort to his bosom. His wife was, in fact, a spendthrift, quarrelsome and bigoted to a degree; and she succeeded in rendering his domestic life absolutely miserable. "She has often provoked my rage" the composer was heard to remark when referring to past recollections. In such circumstances Haydn was virtually living in "his solitude" at Eisenstadt. Companionship—the degree of education amongst the musicians of that period is well known—he had none. What else remained to him, but his music! Next to the contemplation of nature, his art was his comfort, his love. Here, again, the longings and wants of his individual life lent a helping hand to his development as an artist. If in the first movement of the Sonata-form he was anxious to show himself a skilled and efficient composer, and to satisfy the mental requirements of his beloved Prince and master, his soul would commence to hold a discourse with itself in the Adagio, pouring out its individual emotions. In this respect too his immediate surroundings assisted him in being understood. The Hungarian "Volkslied" itself abounds with expressions of individual emotions; and even the Gipsy melodies, saturated as they are with mere sensual perceptions of nature, show traces of this touchingly human element. It is not surprising, therefore, if we also occasionally meet with reminiscences of these melancholy oriental strains in Haydn's compositions.

MUSICAL CHANGES.

BY HENRY C. LUNN.

It has always occurred to us that at the many home-gatherings assembled on this day, when, amidst festive surroundings, the popular toast, "A Happy New Year," is so unanimously responded to, some kindly word of gratitude should also be bestowed upon the happy old one. It is good to look forward—good to anticipate the bright future which we hope lies before us all—but, in looking back, we not only conjure up the many delightful hours we have actually passed, but recall with pleasure the commencement of much earnest and well-considered work which the coming year will but strengthen and develop. In admitting and welcoming, then, our young and untried friend, attractive and winning as may be his appearance, let us not forget that an old and tried one is departing; and that, whatever may be his faults, he has given us so much unalloyed enjoyment during his stay as to have earned at least an affectionate and hearty farewell. The many alterations awaiting us in the "happy" interval alluded to are indeed but the natural growth of time; for institutions to which we fondly cling in one year assume only a different shape in another, moulding themselves almost insensibly to the requirements of the day, and appealing to the sympathies of the innovative many, whilst they shock not materially the conservative few.

Our musical new year certainly commences with some important changes; but these changes have been brought about by no sudden convulsions; most of them have been foreseen by those who shut not their eyes to the progress of events, and many have been aided by the all-powerful force of public opinion.

Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir has taken its farewell of the public, and been finally dissolved. The founder and Conductor of this excellent body of vocalists has been presented with a testimonial of esteem and gratitude, which assuredly he has fairly earned by his indefatigable zeal and devotion to the cause. But may it not be gently whispered that concerts professedly given for the interpretation of the most delicate part-music become—when the novelty has worn off—somewhat wearisome? Indeed, was not the gradual increase of compositions of a different character in the programmes a decided admission of the fact? And, again, did not the absolute necessity of including more important choral works, with orchestra, compel the Conductor either to urge the members of his Choir beyond their legitimate power, or to seek assistance from strangers? Undoubtedly Mr. Leslie has done incalculable good by showing us that a Choir can be trained in this country to a state of absolute perfection, and the legacy he has left us will not be forgotten; but it is in the rendering of the great choral compositions that the fruits of this teaching should now be exhibited, for audiences will no longer rest satisfied with such chorus-singing as might often have been heard before the establishment of "Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir."

Everybody acknowledges the vast benefit conferred upon the art by the Sacred Harmonic Society during the many years it has been before the public; and when rumours began to spread of its probable dissolution, it is scarcely necessary to say that the disappointment was both sincere and widely spread. Much had been done by this Institution, but much remained to be done; and it was earnestly hoped, therefore, that its labours would not cease whilst its mission was but partially accomplished. Exeter Hall was certainly not available; but many began to ask not only whether Exeter Hall was the only place in the metropolis where sacred music could be performed, but whether the removal of the Society's concerts to a smaller locality would not be an absolute benefit. "Additional accompaniments" to Handel's works were perhaps already somewhat interfering with the delicacy of the composer's score, and the choir was gradually increasing in power to cope with them. Here then, again, public opinion had unquestionably something to do with the result; for had not the feeling at which we have hinted been in existence, the Society might have been broken up simply because its concerts could no longer be given in Exeter Hall. Several changes have undoubtedly been necessary before commencing a new season at St. James's Hall, yet many of these have been the very changes which the best friends of the Society have long wished for. True it is that the attraction will now be rather the quality than the quantity of the performers; but as the room is smaller, more finish will be necessary in the rendering of the works; and as we know that Sir Michael Costa has the welfare of the Society at heart, a glorious future may probably open upon it by the adoption of those measures which at first seemed to threaten its very existence.

The establishment of a Guarantee Fund for the Philharmonic Society, the reduction of the concerts from eight to six, and the internal dissensions which have resulted in the secession of some of the directors, might have been foretold by all who know how the Society has latterly ceased to adhere to the policy which ruled its early councils. Foremost in recognising genius wherever it could be found, this Association made the public acquainted with works which, but for such aid, might have remained unknown for years. The programmes at the concerts were models which might be followed with advantage in the present day; and the subscribers looked forward with the utmost interest to the commencement of each season. That this prestige might easily be restored there can be no doubt; but extensive reforms must be instituted, and all individual feelings sacrificed, so that the works to be performed and the artists to perform them shall be selected solely with the view of appealing to the most cultivated audiences. The Philharmonic Society is not an institution which should be allowed to pass away; and we feel convinced that if those in authority make judicious use of the power intrusted to them, they will have no cause to complain of want of patronage.

The change of feeling with regard to Italian Opera in this country is one on which, in the interest of healthy music, we cannot but congratulate ourselves. At Covent Garden Theatre the lessee heroically endeavours to preserve only the traditional fashionable season; but Her Majesty's Theatre is gradually becoming the "People's Opera House"; for here we have not only Italian operatic performances at cheap prices, but Mr. Carl Rosa has shown us, and will continue to show us, that the highest class Operas can be sung in the English language. The real lovers of the best lyrical works, too, are beginning to perceive that an Opera efficiently cast in every part is infinitely more satisfactory to listen to than one in which a pet prima donna is "supported" by a number of third-rate artists; and, should this feeling become more general, lessees may probably in time be enabled to select their own Operas, instead of having them selected by the vocalists. The year now dawning upon us may perhaps reveal some more truths long hidden by the tyrannous reign of fashion over our English lyrical establishments; for the taste of the general public having now been unmistakably shown, it is not at all likely that lessees will continue to consult only the wishes of those aristocratic subscribers upon whom they formerly relied for support.

All who watch with interest the growth of music in this country must see that those exclusive Institutions which persistently narrow their operations in the slightest degree must inevitably decline. The "Ancient Concerts" would scarcely have lived as long as they did had they not been propped up by noble patrons; the "British Orchestral Society" ceased to exist because patriotism—although an essential element in questions of war—has nothing whatever to do with questions of art; and even the "Bach Society" sees the necessity of not limiting its programmes to the works of one composer. A "Handel Festival," for example, flourishes, as it deserves to do, once in three years; but a "Handel Society," with its series of concerts every season, would unquestionably gradually decay. Let then our hopes for the future be strengthened by the experience of the past; and, in spite of many inevitable changes, the "Happy New Year" which we wish our readers and all who love musical art will be as certainly realised as earnestly anticipated.

THE LEEDS FESTIVAL SURPLUS.

THE Musical Festival recently held in the great Yorkshire town yielded a profit of £2,371 19s. 4d. In view of this large sum, two questions, of more than local interest, suggest themselves—How was it obtained? and, How should it have been appropriated? An answer to the first is easy, because the Committee have published every particular needful to a correct conclusion. The surplus was due, in part, to an increased attendance. In 1877 the aggregate audience numbered 13,400, whereas in 1880 it rose to 14,854. Of course the receipts rose with it, being in 1877, £7,896, and in 1880, £9,298. But this only accounts for £1,402 out of the £2,371 profit, and for an explanation of the balance, after adding a sum (£800) equal to the profit in 1877, we must look to the outlay. Here a surprise awaits us. We all know that the tendency of Festival expenses is to increase. Performers, having obtained so much, want more, and, unless held in check with a stern hand, the "sundries" are sure to run riot with alarming consequences to the balance-sheet. But at Leeds the Committee cut down their expenditure; and, wonder of wonders, contrived to do so by paying the principal singers less than usual—so much less that they were able to deal liberally with band and chorus, and still be £172 to the good. We congratulate the Leeds Committee on this feat, trusting that their practical protest against the exorbitant demands of popular singers will be taken up elsewhere. Of late years there has been a rivalry among vocalists on the question of terms, and in many cases it has become a matter of honour for A not to take less than B, the result being that B, indignant at the presumption of A, shoots ahead every time he is caught, while their employers have to pay for the game. An amusing case in point was supplied not long ago, when Madame Nilsson distanced Madame Patti by obtaining £200 per night, and the insulted diva retorted by exacting 200 guineas, the £10 per night excess acting as balm to her wounded spirit. This may be all very well for the artists, but it is serious indeed for the managers, who find themselves compelled to starve their enterprises in other departments that the demands of the principals may be met. On business grounds we ought not, perhaps, to blame our exigent favourites. A man who has anything to sell is justified in getting the utmost he can for it—which indeed is its value, provided the transaction be in all respects honest. But it is also true that the buyer is justified in giving no more than he can persuade the seller to take. Upon this principle the Leeds Committee worked. They said to each artist, “We will give you so much; yes or no?” and with one prominent exception, their offer was accepted. We quite see that not all concert-givers are able to make so positive a stand. Prominent singers know very well that they cannot afford to be out of such a Festival as that of Leeds, while in many other cases absence involves no loss of prestige. Nevertheless more firmness in dealing with artists would have its effect, and divert for the good of the ensemble much that hitherto has been squandered on the solo.

Coming to the second question, How should the surplus have been appropriated? We are bound to consider the fact that the performances were announced to take place for the benefit of the Leeds Medical Charities; that the guarantee fund of £12,000 was raised on that understanding, and that the guarantors were bound, in dealing with the surplus, to keep faith with themselves and the public. But, were we discussing the appropriation of an unpledged amount, we should distinctly indicate a better way. Far be it from us to undervalue medical charities. Often they are not the best managed institutions in the world, but even when they relieve suffering at an extravagant cost, it is well to have suffering relieved. At the same time it is absurd to suppose that the wealthy folk of Leeds will not adequately support their infirmaries and hospitals unless they get a quid pro quo in the shape of musical entertainment. Either we must conclude that the Leeds charities do not need the Festival, or we must think hard things of the town. Naturally, we prefer the more agreeable course, and, as a logical result, we share the opinions of those who contend that musical festivals are not only worth establishing, but, in this case and others, should be established purely for the good of the art. We are glad to see that an idea very much like our own prevails among a section of the Yorkshire amateurs, and has influential supporters in the councils of the Festival. Thus, at a meeting of the guarantors on December 2, it was proposed that a previous resolution, restricting the committee to £200 out of the profits, should be rescinded. Against this only one voice was upraised, on the ground that strict faith ought to be kept. But it was pointed out on the other side, that the amount at disposal was so much greater than even the most sanguine expected, that the warmest friend of the charities would not complain if more than £200 was appropriated to the cause of music. The motion, on this, passed unanimously, and Councillor Spark then moved to hand over to the Committee for Festival purposes the balance of profit over £2,000. Mr. Spark advised that this sum should be set aside as a reserve fund to meet possible loss on future occasions; but he seems to have been moved to do so less by anticipation of failure in time to come than by fear that use of the money in directly promoting local musical culture would excite jealousy and involve dispute. For this fear there may have been good grounds. It is hard to move in such matters without treading upon some one's toes, and the Festival, which should supply a common rallying point for all, cannot afford to offend any. We are quite ready to believe, therefore, that Mr. Spark spoke words of wisdom in counselling the establishment of a reserve fund. That fund will probably grow in course of time, and as it grows the Committee will be more and more pressed to consider whether, without offending local interests, it is not their duty to adopt, beyond the limits of festival operations, such measures as may conduce to the general good of the art.

GRANTING that there are associations clinging around most buildings which cannot be dissevered without causing a certain shock to the feelings, there can be no doubt that, although this may be termed “sentiment,” it is fully entitled to respect. If, for example, the rooms appropriated in the season to the Exhibition of the Royal Academy of Arts were to be opened during the winter as a Coffee Palace, or St. James's Hall to be appropriated to walking matches when not required for concerts, we should all feel that, for commercial purposes, these buildings were forced from their legitimate use. We will not now dwell upon the modern custom of holding religious services in theatres—incongruous as such proceedings appear to us—because the object of our journal is apart from this question; but we cannot help protesting against what seems a desecration of those establishments especially built for the performance of the lyrical drama. At one house, as soon as the Opera season is over, a “Promenade,” with unlimited refreshments, is constructed on the very spot where but a few nights before our greatest artists were heard in some of our greatest works; and, at a merely nominal rate of admission, it need scarcely be said what kind of “Promenade” audience is usually there assembled. True it is that musical compositions are performed—and excellently too—during the time; but these, although listened to by the occupants of the stalls and boxes, are considered by the majority of those not seated as mere accompaniments to the more serious business of the evening. At the other house—which bears Her Majesty's name—we have a troupe of “niggers,” who sing, grin, dance, and distort themselves on the stage of some of our best recent lyrical triumphs. The “seething mass of humanity,” as they termed the audiences which applauded their efforts a few months ago, has emboldened them to reappear, and they will no doubt occupy the theatre until compelled to make room for another Opera Company. Is it not within the bounds of possibility that some country families, in London for a short time, may go to “Her Majesty's Opera,” with the certainty that they shall hear a lyrical work, and not find out their mistake until they see the stage covered with blacks?

AN evening contemporary, the St. James's Gazette, recently announced, on the strength of a letter addressed to Mr. Mapleson by a “prominent citizen of New York,” that the problem of utilising the telephone for the benefit of amateurs who wish to hear the music of public performances without leaving their own homes has been solved. We are unable, after reading the letter, to take this sanguine view of the case. The writer, Mr. E. P. Fry, tells no more about music by telephone than we already knew, nor does his experience seem to be a whit more satisfactory than that of the amateurs who heard the Leeds Festival performances by wire. Mr. Fry describes the drawbacks to the perfect working of the telephone as "few and slight, and possibly remediable." That science will remove them we hope and believe, but they are certainly not slight. On this point let Mr. Fry himself be witness. He says: "The chief one (drawback) is a confused, jangling, blurred sound, like the rattling of a large sheet of brass, which accompanies and envelopes the very loud and very high tones in the choruses and finales. The other defect is the non-conveyance of the full quantity and exact quality of certain instruments, notably the violoncellos, double-basses, trombones, tubas, kettle-drums, side-drum, bass-drum, cymbals, oboes, and bassoons." Our readers will have no difficulty in estimating the value of an instrument which refuses to convey, or misrepresents, the sound of half the instruments in the orchestra, and accompanies the tones of the rest with a noise "like the rattling of a large sheet of brass." On this testimony, backed by personal observation at Leeds, we are compelled to see in the telephone, as now used for musical purposes, a mere toy, interesting enough, but of slight practical value. No one, however, should "despise the day of small things." The telephone is at present a baby instrument. When its majority is attained, subscribers to our musical societies may be renting wires and listening to symphonies and oratorios by their own fire-sides, in all the ease of dressing-gown and slippers.

THE generalisations of scientific men should always be received with caution, because, in the race for the honours of discovery, they are apt to arrive at conclusions from insufficient data. Thus caution would seem eminently applicable to the statements made by Dr. Delauney, before the Medical Academy of Paris, on the "History and Limitation of the Human Voice." The doctor said, among other things, "the lower the race-type, the higher pitched the voice," and to this conclusion he was probably helped by the prevalence of high voices among Eastern peoples. But if it be generally correct, how are we to account for the splendid basses heard in profusion throughout Russia, or for the fact that the average pitch of the male voice in England is higher than it was a century ago? At present we have very few legitimate bass voices before the public, while the music written for basses by old English composers is now often found too low. Our American cousins, moreover, are noted for a high pitch, and they certainly do not belong to a low-type race. The doctor goes on to say that, as a rule, "tenors are tall and slender, whilst profound basses are short and thick-set." But the exceptions to this rule are, for the theory, disastrously numerous. Among the tenors of our own country, how many are tall and slender, and how many of the class to which Signor Foli belongs are short and thick-set? Among foreign artists best known to us, Signor Mongini was not tall and slender; neither was Signor Giuglini, nor is Signor Campanini. We greatly fear that Dr. Delauney has been somewhat too hasty, and not extended his data far enough; or else has formed his conclusion first, and then looked up materials to support it. When the Pickwick Club found a stone covered with mysterious letters, they began by determining it to be an object of antiquarian interest, and gave themselves a lot of trouble in search of proof; whereas, looked at with an open mind as well as an open eye, the inscription plainly read, "Bill Stumps, his mark."

classes, it is but fair that all interested in the subject should know how very widely spread is the protest against the system so long used and known as that of the "Fixed Doh." If the "Tonic Sol-fa" method had thoroughly satisfied all requirements, we should have heard but little of any opposition to its progress; but when we find that many others are not only proposed, but extensively used, although we may not, upon examination, admit them to be by any means perfect systems, we must at least see that the subject is not yet set at rest. The truth is that the "Staff" method in some form, if not the best, is assuredly the most popular foundation for a method of notation for class-singing, because the singers see the sounds rising and falling as they hear them; and although we grant that the inequalities of the intervals do not appear, the idea of a scale (or ladder) is still preserved. Hamilton's "Patent Union Notation"—in which the degrees of the scale are printed in the head of the note—and Mr. Colville's "Letter-note Method"—in which they are printed above them—seem already to be tolerably well established, if we may judge from the music forwarded to us by the inventors of the systems; but in both these—even admitting the possibility in the first-named system of always reading the small letters indicating the degrees of the scale—the attempt to unite two methods in order to retain the staff seems scarcely so good as Mr. Curwen's attempt to construct one system without a staff. We cannot say that we think the true method of notation for class-singing yet exists; but as the war goes bravely on, it is good that we should occasionally furnish our readers with news from the battle-fields.

It is a great pity that persons who devote themselves to proving that an artist has earned a right to the world's reverence should commence by endeavouring to prove that those who have already gained this distinction should be at once displaced. That Shakespeare, for example, is "immensely over-rated," has often been said by smart modern critics; but the following quotation from a newspaper published in New York, by far eclipses everything we have ever read on this subject. After telling us that "Shakespeare has had his day," the acute and far-seeing writer says, "From beginning to end Hamlet is a mere mouther, and it is only rant that gives Othello and Macbeth the appearance of action. Any modern play as deficient in business as all of Shakespeare's pieces are, would be unhesitatingly condemned." Now we know perfectly well that when an attack is made upon a recognised genius in musical composition, the interest of some genius not recognised is in the heart of the writer; and he really believes that while such men as Mozart, Mendelssohn, Handel and a few others crowd the building, it is impossible for a comparative stranger to take a place in the temple of fame. We will not stop to inquire who the American critic thinks should arise on the ruined reputation of William Shakespeare; but no doubt—as in the similar musical instances we have mentioned—he is ready as soon as room can be made for him. It is very true all real artists know that the great men thus assailed can defend themselves tolerably well by their works; but the general public too often lend a willing ear to these criticisms, and, believing that "what everybody says must be false," (to reverse the well-known proverb), give credit to the verdict of the self-elected enlightened few.

WE have always imagined that the peculiarity of every piece of mechanism is that its action is mechanical. A metronome, for example, is a pure machine, and therefore, although it beats the time with accuracy, we cannot set it in motion to guide an orchestra in a concert-room. Latterly, however, we have lighted upon the description of a musical instrument on which it is said every one can perform; it plays any tune, and requires no musical knowledge on the part of the player. From this we should infer that it is a machine; but then we read that "it renders sacred music with wonderful expression, and is strictly accurate in melody, harmony, and rhythm, rivalling, if not surpassing, the most expert performer." This puzzles us; for if, without human agency, it can perform with "wonderful expression," and rival, if not surpass, the "most expert performer," we find that machines are no longer machines, and that the days of our great pianists, therefore, are numbered. A "Mechanical Concert" at St. James's Hall would indeed be a novelty; but it is evident that such an event may in time come to pass. We can imagine that an audience will sit entranced at the depth of expression emanating from a musical box; and that at the conclusion of the performance the maker will be called forward to bow his acknowledgments. Indeed, presuming that a machine can execute a Concerto, there can be no reason why machines should not play the accompaniments; and if all these several pieces of mechanism "rival, if not surpass, the most expert performer," the result must be indeed charming. In criticising artists (should persons be found to listen to them), one effect of the spread of such concerts as we have endeavoured to sketch will be that a "mechanical player" will be no longer a term of opprobrium.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THIS establishment closed on the 11th ult., the only event of any importance since our last notice being the production of an Italian version of Wallace's Opera, "Maritana," with recitatives especially written for the occasion by Signor Tito Mattei. Anything which can disguise the words of the original libretto by Fitzball is undoubtedly of advantage to the effect of the work in performance; but, apart from this, the Opera was worth reviving if only to show how much such an artist as Madame Trebelli can make of the part of Lazarillo. It is scarcely too much to say that the song, "Alas! those chimes," may possibly achieve a second popularity through the exquisite singing of Madame Trebelli, the encore, which was positively insisted upon, showing that the public has still a lingering fondness for the simple and expressive ballad. The repetition of the melodious trio, "Turn on, old Time" (we cannot refrain from giving the English titles), was also, doubtless, owing chiefly to the co-operation of this eminent vocalist. Mdlle. Elisa Widmar fully sustained, if she did not add to, her reputation by her performance of the title-character, her singing, though a little wanting in power, being at least artistic and refined. Signor Vizzani, as Don César, was fully equal to the vocal, but scarcely to the dramatic, requirements of the part. His two important songs, "Yes, let me like a soldier fall," and "There is a flower," were redemanded; and his portion of the trio to which we have already alluded was most effectively given. The King and Don José were ably represented by Signor Ghilberti and Mr. Barrington Foote respectively, Signor Pro and Madame Barnadelli lending valuable aid in the minor parts. The production of Verdi's "Aida" afforded an opportunity for Madame Zacchi to prove that, although neither a great actress nor a great singer, she can satisfactorily sustain such a part as Verdi's heroine in an establishment where in her particular line she has had no rival during the season. It is needless to say how finely Madame Trebelli sang the music assigned to Amneris; but praise must again be given to Signor Aldighieri, who, in the character of Amonasro, created a marked effect, and contributed in a great measure to the favourable reception of the work. Signor Runcio, as Radames, and Mr. Barrington Foote, as the King, were thoroughly satisfactory; but Signor Ordinas was scarcely equal to the music of the High Priest, Ramfis.

Why the many vocalists who have failed during the short season under Mr. Armit's management were allowed to appear, we, of course, cannot say; but it may be fairly assumed that Madame Zacchi, Signor Aldighieri, and perhaps Mdlle. Widmar, are the only artists we shall be likely to hear of again. The lessee may certainly claim credit for having kept his promises; and if, by doing so, he has unconsciously proved that Italian Opera has seen its best days, and that the public will not tolerate third-rate singers, he has done good to the progress of the lyrical art in this country, although he may have become a martyr in the cause.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

At the Concert of Saturday, November 27, a new violoncellist, Monsieur Hollman, made his first appearance at the Crystal Palace, introducing, for the first time in England, Camille Saint-Saëns's Violoncello Concerto in A minor. Monsieur Hollman is solo violoncellist to the King of Holland. His tone is of very unusual power, and at the same time rich, rather than coarse; his intonation is excellent, and his execution neat and finished. There is such a "plentiful lack" of solo music for the violoncello with orchestral accompaniment, that it is perhaps hardly wise to be too critical when a new work of this class is brought forward; at the same time, we cannot refrain from expressing the opinion that M. Saint-Saëns' Concerto is not a very valuable addition to the small répertoire available for violoncellists. It has a rather quaint and pretty middle movement—a sort of Intermezzo, allegro con moto, which takes the place of a slow movement; but the rest of the Concerto, though effectively and brilliantly written for the soloist, and clever enough in its workmanship, is by no means interesting in its chief themes, and fails to inspire us with the slightest wish to hear it again. M. Hollman's playing was worthy of better music. A very fine performance of Brahms's first Symphony was given on the same afternoon. The programme also included a melodious Adagio for violin and viola soli, from a recently published Divertimento by Mozart (Köchel, 205), the solo parts of which were well rendered by Messrs. Jung and Krause. The other orchestral numbers were Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus," and two ballet-airs from Ponchielli's "Le Due Gemelle." Mr. Edward Lloyd was the vocalist.

Goetz's lovely Symphony in F, Op. 9, was a special feature of the Concert on the 4th ult., when it was given for the second time at the Crystal Palace. Increased familiarity with the whole heightens our admiration of its many beauties; the Intermezzo and the Finale may certainly rank among the best pieces which the lamented composer has left us. Whether the Symphony will ever be popular, in the ordinary sense of that term, it would be rash to predict; many of its beauties are, perhaps, too refined for general appreciation; but there can be doubt that musicians at least will prize the work at its true value. The only other novelty on this afternoon was Chopin's interesting, though badly scored, Fantasia on Polish Airs for piano and orchestra, the solo part of which was given to perfection by Mdlle. Janotha. Mdlle. Pyk, the vocalist at this Concert, fully sustained the reputation she had gained at her previous appearances. Bennett's Overture to the "Naiades" was the opening, and Berlioz's orchestral arrangement of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse" the concluding number of the programme.

On the 11th ult. Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" was given for the first time in London, the composer himself conducting the performance. The work was criticised in such detail in our columns on the occasion of its first production at Leeds in October last, that it is only needful now to say a few words about the performance. The soloists were Mrs. Osgood, Madame Patey, and Messrs. E. Lloyd, F. King, and H. Cross, all of whom did full justice to the music. The same may be said of the orchestra; but the choruses, which form so important a part of the work, were very indifferently, not to say inefficiently, rendered by the Crystal Palace Choir, which (not for the first time) proved itself altogether unworthy of the reputation of the Concerts. In spite of this shortcoming, the work was enthusiastically received by a crowded audience.

The interest of the final Concert before Christmas centred in the production of a violin Concerto in D by Gernsheim. The works of this composer have hitherto made but little way in England, one or two examples of his ability having been received with but moderate favour at the Popular Concerts. Herr Gernsheim is now established in Rotterdam, where he occupies the highest position in his profession. If the violin Concerto, his latest work, affords no evidence of true genius, using the term in its ordinarily accepted sense, it shows the very highest qualities of musicianship. The orchestra is not relegated to the position of a "big guitar," as in many Concertos, but, on the contrary, has a most important share in the development of the subject matter. The first movement is a little too spun out, but the Andante affettuoso is charming, and the final Rondo spirited and effective. In form Herr Gernsheim follows accepted models, save that in the first movement a lengthy cadenza takes the place of the working out. Mendelssohn's violin Concerto may have suggested this idea to the composer. The work was played by M. Emil Sauret, whose style we cannot unreservedly admire. He renders brilliant passages with vigour, and an easy mastery over their technical difficulties; but his tone is thin and wiry, and the constant vibrato is disagreeable. The remainder of this Concert may be briefly dismissed. The orchestral items were Beethoven's Symphony in A, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," and, painful to state, the Andante and variations from Schubert's Octet. Mr. Arthur Oswald was the vocalist in place of Mr. Herbert Reeves. He has an agreeable baritone voice, but he might easily have selected less hackneyed songs than Gounod's "Dio possente," and Hatton's "To Anthea." The Concerts will be resumed on February 5th, when Mr. Eugene D'Albert will make his first appearance at the Crystal Palace.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

A NEW era for this Society, as well as a new season, began on the 3rd ult., when its first Concert in St. James's Hall was given. The circumstances which led to the removal of the "Sacred Harmonic" from its old home in the Strand must be familiar to all our readers, and need no recapitulation in detail. Enough if we call to mind that the change was one of compulsion and not of choice. The Society desired, as a matter of course, to remain in its accustomed place, since there only could performances be given under conditions which nearly half-a-century of custom had made to appear essential. But the new proprietors of Exeter Hall, for reasons with which few will sympathise, would not tolerate oratorios for amusement. The old tenants therefore had to quit, and, like a man whose means will no longer allow him to rent a big house, they were compelled to dispose of surplus furniture and begin anew on a more modest scale. In other words the Society removed to St. James's Hall, reduced its band and chorus from 700 to 300, and made a bid for continued favour in a mode which almost entirely altered the distinctive features of its Concerts. We may condole with the members on a hard necessity, but it is possible that out of evil good may come. The Society is now brought more directly into competition with other musical institutions; the prestige of its army of executants has vanished, and the result may be more active efforts to arouse interest and attract subscribers, as well as more painstaking to secure the best possible performances. The fate of the Society, no doubt, hangs upon the experience of the present season, but however it may be determined we are certain that amateurs now give to the "Sacred Harmonic" all the sympathy for which its unsought position calls.

The opening Concert was, we regret to say, not particularly well attended. For this, however, all who are familiar with the ways of the British public were prepared. A public more hard to divert from a beaten course does not exist on the face of this varied earth. It is not that our people are actively opposed to change, because, when the idea of change has been kept sufficiently long before them, they take to it. It is rather that they have tremendous inertia. Set them going in one direction and they will continue going long after strenuous efforts have been made to start on a new path. Naturally, therefore, the British public, or the London section of that estimable body, were unable at the outset to recognise the Sacred Harmonic Society in St. James's Hall. It was an unheard of thing, and required time for properly grasping the situation. Aware of this, the directors may not have been discouraged, and assuredly the performers did not allow empty seats to abate their zeal. We should add, here, that the Society's reduced chorus is a great improvement upon its ponderous predecessor. Composed of some 250 well trained and fresh voices, it is qualified to meet any demands that Sir Michael Costa may see fit to impose. Indeed, with such materials, almost any pitch of excellence can be reached, and we trust to find due advantage taken of the fact. The band still contains a number of amateurs who would be better away, since their services must, in the very nature of things, prove less efficient than those rendered by men to whom music is the daily business of life. The programme of the first Concert had evidently been drawn up with a view to the attraction which variety presents. It contained Beethoven's Mass in C; Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," and the same composer's unfinished Oratorio, "Christus." If we are not mistaken, these works had been previously given in conjunction, but not often enough to rank them among hackneyed things. The interest of the occasion was, therefore, decided. With regard to the music itself it is much too late in the day for descriptive or critical observations. All that can be said, has been repeated times over, and our sole business lies with the performance, the general character of which is easily surmised from previous remarks. The concerted numbers showed a vast improvement upon the "form" of Exeter Hall; though their rendering cannot be described as perfect, owing to an occasional tendency to sink in pitch. In place of overwhelming noise we had expression and musical charm—a change estimated by every amateur present as a decided gain. The soloists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Hancock, Mr. Guy, and Mr. F. King, from whom the strains of Beethoven and Mendelssohn received ample justice. Mrs. Osgood made her mark in the "Lauda Sion," and Mr. Guy, though not in very good voice, effectively delivered the recitatives in "Christus." Sir Michael Costa was at his usual post, and had a warm reception on coming forward to conduct the National Anthem.

The annual Christmas performance of the "Messiah" took place on Friday, the 17th ult., in presence of a crowded audience, and with very great success. Madame Sherrington, Madame Mary Cummings, Mr. Rigby, and Mr. Bridson were the principal singers, the honours falling to Mr. Rigby, as, in excellent voice, he rendered Handel's familiar airs with all necessary expression.

ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

MENDELSSOHN'S "Elijah" was chosen for performance at the second Concert of the season, which took place on Thursday, the 2nd ult., when the Hall was filled by an audience that took little heed of a fog so dense as to render travelling difficult and dangerous—a fog that, defying double doors and closed windows, penetrated into the spacious building. The enthusiasm of the audience was caused, probably, by Madame Albani being announced for the soprano part. But whatever magnetic power solo singers may occasionally have, it is certain that the abiding attraction of these Concerts is the choral singing, which has now reached a high pitch of excellence. In "Elijah" there was wide scope for the display of the choristers' abilities, and they availed themselves of the opportunities presented by singing with tenderness "He watching over Israel," with dramatic vigour "Baal, we cry to thee," and with massive power the triumphant "Thanks be to God." Indeed all the choruses were rendered in a manner that reflected credit on the singers and honour to Mr. Joseph Barnby, their Conductor. As may be imagined, Madame Albani made a great success in the soprano music. Her grand voice enabled her to sustain the very arduous part with that ease so acceptable to the ears and nerves of listeners. "Hear ye, Israel," was declaimed in a manner seldom heard in any concert-room. The part of Elijah was taken by Mr. Ludwig, a name somewhat new to oratorio programmes. Happily Mr. Ludwig's fame had preceded him, for many present, knowing his talents by his interpretation of music in opera, had formed high expectations concerning his assumption of the character of the Prophet. That those expectations were altogether realised it would be useless and wrong to aver. There was, however, much to commend—for instance, "It is enough" and "Open the heavens," which were admirable efforts; but there was a prevailing tinge of melancholy in the reading that was scarcely appropriate to many of the vigorous passages. Mr. Vernon Rigby was in capital voice, and in addition to being highly effective in his two solos, "If with all your hearts" and "Then shall the righteous," he once more asserted his value in the concerted music. Miss Damian received the unusual honour of an encore in "Woe unto thee." This lady has a fine voice, which, however, still requires in its management a little more reserve and artistic treatment. Madame Sterling was also encored for a version of that never-failing favourite air, "O rest in the Lord." Miss Annie Sinclair, with Messrs. T. Hanson and Stanley Smith, assisted in the double quartet. Dr. Stainer throughout the work gave most valuable help at the organ.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

WE have still to record the interesting programme of the Concert which took place on the 29th of November last, consisting of Schubert's Overture for stringed and wind instruments, Haydn's pianoforte Trio in C major, Chopin's Barcarole in F sharp minor for pianoforte, and Molique's Saltarella for violin. The executants on this occasion were Mdle. Janotha, MM. Strauss, L. Ries, Zerbini, Lazarus, Wendland, Wotton, Reynolds, and Piatti. The vocalist was Miss Marian McKenzie.

The first Concert of last month (6th ult.) opened with a capital performance of Mozart's string Quartet in D minor—the second of a series of six dedicated by the composer to Haydn—the executants being Mdle. Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. Mdle. Janotha was the pianist, and—"by desire," as the programme indicated—played with her usual refinement of style, though scarcely with her wonted energy and verve (owing probably to slight indisposition), Mendelssohn's noble Fantasia in F sharp minor; a work well-known to every amateur, and therefore requiring no special comment. Mr. Frederick King, who sang Handel's air "Sorge infausta," from the Opera "Orlando," and Sullivan's song, "If doughty deeds," was well received and deservedly applauded. The Concert was brought to a worthy conclusion by a performance (the twenty-first at these Concerts) of Schumann's pianoforte Quintet in E flat, one of the finest and best sustained inspirations of that deeply poetic composer. It was rendered to perfection by Mdle. Janotha, Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti.

The following evening Concert, and the last one in the old year, took place on the 13th ult., introducing no absolute novelty, but presenting, nevertheless, some features of special interest. Amongst the latter must be named, in the first place, the performance, by Madame Norman-Néruda and Mdle. Janotha, of Brahms's violin and pianoforte Sonata in G major (Op. 78), which was first introduced to London audiences during last season. We have already spoken of the undoubted merits of the work, its dreamy poetry, its pathetic suggestiveness, its undue lengths—not always "heavenly lengths," as Schumann described the same tendency in some of Schubert's compositions. There can be no doubt, however, that the Sonata gains upon us after every hearing, more especially the opening movement, a Vivace in G major, which, both for the beauty of its themes and consistency of structure, is an admirable composition. Of the performance itself by two such consummate artists as the ladies named, it is needless here to say more than that full justice was done to the composer's intentions. The lady pianist was also associated with Signor Piatti in the execution of three pieces for pianoforte and violoncello by Anton Rubinstein (Op. 11), early compositions as the Opus number shows, and almost colourless, scarcely warranting the five repetitions which have already been accorded them at these Concerts. Mdle. Janotha gave a brilliant and highly artistic interpretation of Chopin's Ballade in G minor (Op. 23), for which she was rewarded by a persistent clamouring on the part of the audience for an encore, to which the lady responded by substituting another piece. Mr. Arthur Oswald's fine baritone voice and artistic training were effectively displayed in a very fine rendering of Gounod's "Le Vallon" and Scarlatti's "O cessate di piagarmi." The Concert opened with Haydn's string Quartet in E flat (Op. 71). Mr. Zerbini conducted on each occasion. These Concerts will be resumed on the 6th inst.

BRIGHTON AQUARIUM CONCERTS.

It is not easy to overrate the capacity for musical good of an institution which, though dealing with music as an auxiliary attraction, keeps in its service the nucleus of an orchestra and a competent conductor. Under such circumstances, the seed is always in the ground, ready to take advantage of the first days of genial weather. We have seen the fruit gathered at the Crystal Palace from the germ that, twenty-seven years ago, took the unpromising form of a brass band; and though it would be absurd to look for Sydenham results everywhere, there is no reason why we should not expect proportionate success. The Brighton Aquarium is assuredly one of the institutions that may become fertile of musical good. It has a concert-room which, if hardly a model for imitation, is useful enough for the purpose; the exigencies of every-day entertainments require it to keep a small permanent orchestra; and it has, for a little while past, enjoyed the services, as conductor, of a musician, Mr. F. Corder, whose ability cannot be questioned. Naturally, therefore, we have been looking to the management for indications of readiness to push these advantages as far as possible, and to enlist on behalf of the Aquarium performances the large and increasing mass of cultivated artistic opinion and sympathies. We have not had to look in vain, since in November the directors announced a first series of Orchestral Concerts, to take place on Saturday afternoons, with an increased orchestra, assisted by eminent vocal artists. The enterprise was looked upon as an experiment, and has since concluded, with results we are not yet in a position to announce. But, judging by the largeness of the audiences and abounding evidence of sympathy, the experience was most encouraging. It may even be doubted whether the directors lost money, in itself a remarkable thing, considering how long it usually takes, when orchestral concerts are concerned, to balance income and expenditure. But, whether the result was loss or gain, the immediate action of the management should be the same, since even in presence of loss, the fact that no sufficient trial has been given should govern the case.

The first Concert, given on Saturday, November 27, attracted a crowded audience, as well it might have done, not only by reason of novelty, but on account of the excellence of the programme, in which the greatest composers were fully represented. Appropriately enough, the first piece was Sterndale Bennett's beautiful Overture, "The Naiades," by the performance of which our late eminent countryman had the honour of "inaugurating" the enterprise. Following this charming example of fancy and skill came Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin, solo by M. Sainton, who had the misfortune to break a string in the middle of the first Allegro, and was compelled to use a strange instrument. But even under these untoward conditions the talented artist played with all the verve and facility that so eminently distinguish him. The next selection was the pretty and imaginative Ballet Music from Mr. Corder's Opera, "Morte d'Arthur," and the Concert ended with Beethoven's C minor Symphony. In speaking of the orchestral performance we must be careful to make all fair allowance for unavoidable circumstances. A body of instrumentalists cannot be got to work together in a day. They have to understand each other, and above all to acquire a knowledge of their conductor, before excellence is possible. The Aquarium orchestra, moreover, has not yet the perfect balance which will come, let us hope, by and bye. Taking these things into consideration, the result of the opening Concert was satisfactory. Indeed, we may express our surprise that with players engaged, mostly, for lighter business, so much excellence should have been shown. M. Sainton, in the course of the Concert introduced a Romance and Tarantelle from his own pen; and the vocalist, Miss Mary Davies, sang selections from Weber, F. E. Bache, and Sterndale Bennett in her own pretty and engaging way.

The second Concert, on the Saturday following, was scarcely less well attended than the first. On this occasion, the programme put a heavier tax upon the resources of the orchestra than they could well bear. Works like Raff's Symphony, "Leonore," and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," make grave demands even upon the most qualified and best disciplined players. It was, therefore not to be wondered at that these works scarcely received justice. The Concerto was Mendelssohn's in G minor for the pianoforte, the soloist being Mr. W. Kuhe, who discharged his task in a manner doubtless familiar to, and appreciated by, all present. Mrs. Osgood increased the attraction of the Concert by singing "Rose, softly blooming" in her best style, and Mr. Corder conducted so as to warrant expectation that enlarged experience and practice will give him a good place among wielders of the bâton. Two other Concerts have since been added to the series, not to speak of a performance of the "Messiah," but into the details of these we need not enter, our immediate purpose being to give an idea of the scope and character of the enterprise, to plead on its behalf for support, and to encourage the managers in the honourable path upon which they have had the courage to enter.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

AN Orchestral Concert by the students of this Institution was given at St. James's Hall on the 16th ult., before a numerous audience. Two of the pupils' works were produced on the occasion, both of which were highly creditable to the composers and their teachers. The first—an "Eclogue," by William Sewell (Novello Scholar)—depends chiefly upon its orchestral treatment for effect; and is certainly deserving of commendation, not only on its own intrinsic merits, but as evidencing the possession of powers which may in due time be more amply developed. The second—a Concert Overture by G. J. Bennett—evinces in parts so much real musical feeling and knowledge of orchestral combinations as to make us augur bright hopes for the future, especially considering the youth of the composer. There is decided freshness, both in the themes and their treatment, throughout the work; and, sincerely trusting that the extravagances of the hour may not obscure the natural qualities of the young writer, we cordially wish him every success. From the pianoforte-players we may select Miss Beatrice Davenport and Miss Dinah Shapley for especial praise, the former giving an excellent rendering of the Allegro from Beethoven's Concerto in C minor (with a clever cadence of her own composition), and the latter performing the Allegro from Schumann's Concerto in A minor with accuracy and intelligence. Mr. Charlton T. Speer, in the Allegro from Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, and Mr. R. Harvey Löhr in the Adagio and Rondo from Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, displayed much executive power; but the works seemed hardly well chosen to exhibit the performers at their best. Good specimens of vocal training were displayed by Miss Hilda Wilson in Vacca's "E questo il loco," Miss Margaret Cockburn in Bellini's "Qui la voce," Miss Woolley in Henry Smart's song from "Jacob," "Be thou patient," and Mr. B. Davies in a Recitative and Romance by Signor Fiori, "Darmi in pace," the last-named exhibiting a trained voice and style scarcely to be expected from a student. The Concert commenced with a highly meritorious performance of Mendelssohn's Psalm, "As the hart pants" (the solos given by Miss Kate Bentley, Mrs. Irene Ware, Messrs. Sinclair Dunn, Robertson, A. Jarrett, and Southcote), in which the remarkable excellence of the choir was conspicuously shown, a result mainly attributable to the zeal displayed at rehearsal by Mr. William Shakespeare, the newly appointed Conductor, who made his début on this occasion and directed the whole of the Concert with a care and intelligence which inspired the students with the utmost confidence.

SATURDAY ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

THE third and fourth of these Concerts took place in St. James's Hall in due course, one on the 4th ult., the other on the 18th ult., and this brought to an end the series projected by Mr. Cowen. We hope that the enterprising Conductor feels himself encouraged to give a second course next year, but doubt predominates. Mr. Cowen is now, we fear, another example of the fact that he who caters orchestral music for the British public does so with the almost certainty of heavy loss at the outset. The question in all such cases is as to the depth of the speculator's purse, and his willingness to go on throwing good money after bad in hope of getting both back. If, well armed at each point, he can persevere till the public come to recognise his enterprise as an institution which it is "good form" to support, all will be well. If not so equipped, the sooner he abandons the field the better for his fortune and his peace of mind. This may be a depressing and ungracious state of things, but it exists and we have to make the best of it.

The Concert given on the 4th ult. was, like all the rest, made interesting through novelty. Among other things, a new violin Concerto, by Mr. A. Jackson, late a pupil at the Royal Academy of Music, had a conspicuous place, and enjoyed the advantage of M. Sainton's skill as principal interpreter. This work is a modest production, in which sense we may regard it as becoming to Mr. Jackson's youth and inexperience. It follows carefully the established model, and nowhere indulges in the excursions beyond recognised limits that are so tempting to young composers. Its most attractive movement is the least pretentious of the three. We refer to the Adagio, constructed upon a single large and melodious theme. The Allegro and Finale are, however, by no means without interest, though we are disposed to believe that Mr. Jackson would have done himself more credit had he written a Symphony instead of a Concerto. In this case the solo passages lack effect, as though the composer had not sufficiently mastered the technicalities of the instrument for which he wrote. It is well known that David had a very considerable share in the solo of Mendelssohn's Concerto, and the caution and prudence of the great composer in asking the help of his friend should be imitated in all parallel instances. M. Sainton, it need hardly be said, did full justice to his young friend's work. A second novelty was the Bacchanale composed by Wagner for the first scene of his "Tannhäuser," and sometimes substituted in Germany for that given in the ordinary acting version. The significance of this music is entirely limited to the scene it illustrates, apart from which—the last page or two excepted—it is nothing more than an extraordinary series of noises suggestive as much of anarchy in the realms of sound as of revels on the hill of Venus. We are bound to say, however, that it is fit music to accompany action in which the utmost limits of stage licentiousness are reached if not passed. The piece is decidedly out of place in a concert-room where, as a matter of course, the only meaning it has cannot well be appreciated. Among other interesting features of the programme were Mozart's Concerto in D (No. 13 in Köchel) and Mr. Harold Thomas's Overture, "Mountain, Lake, and Moorland," performed last season at the Philharmonic Concerts. The Concerto is very rarely heard—indeed, it was announced as given for the "first time in London"—but its merit cannot be denied, and Mr. Cowen deserves thanks for affording an opportunity of becoming acquainted with so interesting an example of the master. The slow movement is particularly charming, and was listened to with admiration. Miss Bessie Richards played throughout with care and skill, but she must have smiled on hearing that Mozart thought the work adapted to "make the player warm." What would the composer have said to some of our modern Concertos, for the performance of which a man needs to go into training, and appear in flannels like any other athlete. Schumann's Symphony in B flat, Chopin's Polonaise in D minor, Schubert's Reiter Marsch (orchestrated by Liszt), and some vocal pieces sung by Misses Mary Davies and Orridge were also in the programme.

The principal attraction at the final Concert was a new Symphony in C minor (No. 3), by Mr. F. H. Cowen—a work concerning which Rumour, in her most flattering mood, had for some time been busy. Mr. Cowen avowedly derived his inspiration for this Symphony from Scandinavia. He had visited Sweden and Norway, and returned impressed, as all must needs be, with the characteristics of a stern and romantic land, in itself a poem. The influences felt he now strives to convey to others, in some degree, through the medium of his art. To this end, two movements, the Adagio and Scherzo, have a definite "programme." In the one case is called up the picture of a lake or fiord, calm and still in the summer moonlight, while all around silence reigns, save when a merry song is heard as a boating party glides past. In the other, we have the idea of a sleigh ride with its exhilarating motion and cheery tinkinnabulation. The first and last movements, on the other hand, are left entirely to the imagination of the listener, who makes of them what he will, and is at liberty to suppose that the Allegro portrays the half-stern half-tender character of Scandinavian romance and song, while the Finale depicts the rugged grandeur of nature and the wild moods in which she is apt to indulge amid her northern fastnesses. However this may be, it is undeniable that Mr. Cowen has succeeded in giving a distinctly Scandinavian character to his symphony, not only by imitating in some cases the peculiarities of Swedish and Norwegian melodies, but by a form and spirit more easily recognised as appropriate than described in words. The first movement is, in this sense, most attractive, while, from a purely musical standpoint, it appears of a high order. Its themes are as quaint as they are beautiful, and as plaintive, not to say sad, as they are quaint, while their general treatment, after a strictly classic model, shows the hand of a skilful and ingenious musician. The descriptive slow movement is steeped in "local colour." Again we observe the influence of Scandinavian melody, while the calm reflectiveness of the music as a whole, and the contrast afforded by the cheerful song of the revellers, give a poetic interest to the movement which heightens its charm. The Scherzo runs its course in cheery and picturesque fashion, varied by a Trio of a wholly different character and decided originality, since it chiefly contains repetitions by one instrument after another of an unaccompanied four-bar phrase. The Finale is, at first hearing, the least satisfactory part of the work. Its two principal themes are bold, energetic, and striking, but they seem to be elaborated with effort, and are so much alike in general character, that even the introduction of parts of the Adagio and Scherzo does not afford necessary relief. This impression, however, may vanish on closer acquaintance, and, in any case, the movement is too elaborate for judgment after a single hearing. Concerning the work as a whole, we are safe in speaking positively. It is a marked advance on anything Mr. Cowen has yet done, and cannot fail to draw towards the composer the attention of amateurs as to one who may accomplish great things for English music. The Symphony was well performed, and received with much favour, Mr. Cowen having a double recall.

Other novelties were an Overture, "Titania," by Mr. H. C. Nixon, a provincial professor, and a "tone-picture" called "The Ebbing Tide," by Mr. John F. Barnett. Mr. Nixon's work is of a peculiar character, and shows more natural capacity than acquired art. The composer should carefully study the best models, and try his skill again. Mr. Barnett's piece, on the other hand, is a finished thing, but so small and, in some respects, commonplace, that it cannot be considered as worthily representing his powers. Bach's Concerto in D, for violin, flute, and piano, was well played by Mr. V. Nicholson, Mr. Barrett, and Madame Frickenhaus; and the conductor's Suite de Ballet, "The Language of Flowers," was repeated by desire. The vocalists were Mrs. Osgood and Mr. E. Lloyd, who respectively made their mark in a Scene, "Hero and Leander," by A. Goring Thomas, and Gounod's "Lend me thine aid."

BRIXTON CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE second Concert of the present season was given at the Angell Town Institution on the 20th ult., with an excellent programme, consisting of Ferdinand Hiller's "Song of Victory," Weber's "Preciosa," and Mendelssohn's "Loreley." Dr. Hiller's work has unfortunately been too much neglected until the performance at the Albert Hall in March last served to direct attention again to its merits, and it is not likely to suffer any more from want of appreciation. As the Cantata was criticised on the occasion referred to, we need not again speak of it in detail. The term revival might be even more fittingly employed in reference to Weber's "Preciosa"; and in condensing the drama into lyrical form for concert-room purposes, Herr C. O. Sternau rendered a service to musicians. As this version is now available in England, through the translation by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, Weber's delightful music, which sounds as fresh now as it did fifty-eight years ago, will assuredly become familiar enough. According to the statement of Mr. Charles Fry, who recited the verses with great intelligence, the performance on the occasion under notice was probably the first in this country, and the Brixton Society may fairly take whatever credit is due to this circumstance. Miss Alma Sanders and Mr. Humphrey Stark, at the pianoforte, and Mr. Charles Wilkes at the organ, did their best with the accompaniments, though, of course, the want of an orchestra was felt, and still more so in the "Loreley." The choir sang exceedingly well throughout the evening, and Madame Worrell rendered full justice to the soprano solos in the several works. Mr. William Lemare conducted with his usual ability.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

THE special Advent Service, instituted two years ago in St. Paul's Cathedral, was again held with as great success, from a musical point of view, as either of its predecessors, on Tuesday evening, the 7th ult. The central feature of this special service is the rendering in its entirety of Spohr's "Last Judgment"; but, to save the service from degenerating into anything savouring of a sacred concert, the Dean and Chapter very wisely herald the Oratorio by two penitential psalms, together with a portion of the Communion Service, and, certainly not the least important, by a printed paper of Thoughts on and for Advent, which, handed to every comer (as far as practicable) on entering the Cathedral, may be read and pondered over in the interval of waiting, and the first sentence whereof—"The object of this musical service is not to gratify the ear or the taste"—is the key-note of the whole service.

The magnificent Choir of the Cathedral received, with one or two trifling exceptions, no external support; and as the Oratorio was sung through without any break between its two sections, and with only such rest to the singers as was afforded by the overture between the first and second parts, it will be seen that their task was by no means a light one, and if some slight signs of fatigue were noticeable in the final chorus, it will scarcely be a matter for surprise. We venture to think the tempo in this chorus and in the first overture may have been a trifle faster than necessary, but with this exception the rendering of the work was an exceptionally fine one, and reflected the greatest credit on soloists, chorus, and organist.

THE first Concert of the season of the Highbury Philharmonic Society was held on Monday evening, the 13th ult., at the Highbury Athenæum. This Society, led by Dr. Bridge, may be mentioned as one of the most enterprising of those suburban musical institutions which afford so much satisfaction to the chroniclers and well-wishers of the musical art connected with our vast metropolis. Last season the Society gave a first performance of a Cantata composed by their distinguished Conductor, and this winter's series of Concerts was inaugurated by the production of a new work by Dr. Gladstone, entitled "Nicodemus," the words having been selected and arranged by the Rev. George Willoughby Barrett, Precentor of Norwich. The subject is divided into three parts, termed, "The timidity of love," "The boldness of love," and "The faithfulness of love," each being illustrated by the recorded character, sayings, and doings of Nicodemus. Dr. Gladstone has undoubtedly many qualifications for the task of composing a Cantata, having had varied experience, and being not only a sound scholar but also a skilful worker in the musical craft, proofs of which are found in the choruses of "Nicodemus," particularly in "I will give thanks" (No. 7), and still more markedly in "Trust ye in the Lord" (No. 12), wherein the fugal passages are worked with considerable elaboration and effect. The chorus for female voices, "The Spirit and the Bride" (No. 9), is somewhat too trivial in theme for the subject, especially in the opening phrases, and the passage worked in imitation, on the words "Thou wilt give them drink" is too feebly developed to stamp the number with the dignity demanded by the subject. There is an air for soprano, "What, gazing on your Saviour's face" (No. 4); and also one for tenor "Come, and rejoice" (No. 6). Of the two, the latter with its flute obbligato part—which, by the way, was not played in time by the flautist of the Philharmonic Society—is perhaps the more effective. Concerning the instrumentation generally a feeling was gradually entertained by the listeners that the work was composed originally to an organ accompaniment, and then arranged for the orchestra. It is but natural that one's adopted instrument should be the medium for the expression of musical thoughts, yet it must not be forgotten that to compose for the modern orchestra according to modern notions, the instrumental score, full and entire, must be the direct medium. Under the superintendence of Dr. Bridge, the work was admirably performed. Only two solo singers are required, a soprano and tenor. Miss Annie Marriott was announced for the former, but was prevented, by indisposition, from fulfilling her engagement. Miss Thornthwaite, a member of the choir, undertook the part at a short notice, and sang it in a manner worthy of all praise. Mr. Alfred Kenningham interpreted the tenor music efficiently. At the conclusion of the Cantata, Dr. Gladstone was called on to the platform to receive the cordial congratulations of the choir and enthusiastic applause of the audience. Handel's "Acis and Galatea" was given in the second part.

The competition for the "Hine Gift," at the Royal Academy of Music, for students under seventeen years of age "who may have composed the best English ballad," took place on Saturday, the 18th ult. The gift was awarded to Annie V. Muckle. The "Santley" prize, purse of ten guineas, for the best accompanying, was also competed for on the same day. Percy Strauders obtained the prize. The competition for the "Potter Exhibition" (any branch of music) took place on Monday, the 20th ult. The examiners were Sir Julius Benedict, Dr. Steggall, Messrs. Randegger, F. R. Cocks, Walter Macfarren, Harold Thomas, Walter Fitton, M. Garcia, R. Jewson, F. Westlake, W. H. Holmes, H. R. Evers, Brinley Richards, and the Principal (Chairman). There were twenty-five candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Margaret Syde. A second Exhibition, presented by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, in memory of her master, Cipriani Potter, was awarded to Beatrice Davenport. The "Westmoreland Scholarship" was competed for on the same day. The examiners were Messrs. Randegger, F. R. Cocks, G. Benson, F. Walker, E. Fiori, R. Litt, J. P. Goldberg, M. Garcia, E. Holland, W. H. Cummings, and the Principal (Chairman). There were twenty-three candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Hilda Wilson. The competition for the "Balfé Scholarship," for composition, took place on Tuesday, the 21st ult. The examiners were Messrs. Davenport, H. C. Lunn, Brinley Richards, H. C. Banister, and the Principal (Chairman). There were five candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to George John Bennett (for the third time).

AN evening Concert was given by Miss Emily Lawrence in the rooms of the Royal Academy of Music, on Tuesday, November 30. The bénéficiaire was assisted by the following artists: Misses Nunn, Clara Samuëll, Orridge, Madame Bolingbroke, and Lady Benedict; Messrs. Sydney Beckley, Charles Fletcher, H. R. Rose, and W. Henry Thomas. The programme was most carefully chosen, and contained more compositions of sterling merit than are usually to be found at Concerts of this class. For instance, in the first part were the names of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Handel, and Schubert; and in the second part, Raff, Benedict, Rossini, and Donizetti. The execution of the different items was generally to be commended. Miss Orridge and Miss Samuëll were highly successful in their efforts, and Madame Bolingbroke obtained applause by her delivery of a well-written song by Miss Lawrence, entitled "In manus tuas"; Mr. Fletcher received the honour of a recall after his facile rendering of De Beriot's Andante and Rondo Russe. The concert-giver played several solos, including some "Songs without words" from her own pen, in each case proving herself to be a musician of culture. Mr. W. Henry Thomas was a most able accompanist.

THE Special Services which for several years past have attracted crowds to St. Anne's, Soho, on the Fridays in Advent, have this winter been repeated on the 3rd, 10th, and 17th ult. As before, Bach's Cantata, "My spirit was in heaviness," occupied on each occasion the central position, but a somewhat important variation from the arrangements for previous years was the introduction of the "Dies Iræ" movements of Mozart's "Requiem Mass," in place of the ordinary psalms and canticles, an innovation by which the music-loving portion of the congregation were certainly not losers. The orchestra, consisting of some sixteen performers, and the choir, numbering over sixty voices, boys and men in equal proportions, were conducted by Mr. Barnby; the newly appointed Organist, Mr. W. Hodge, presiding at the organ. We regret to see that considerable doubt exists as to whether these Services can be held next Advent, owing to the utter inadequacy of the offertories to meet the heavy expenses. It is scarcely creditable to the musical public to profit by the free admission to the church, filling it on each occasion, and then to withhold from the offertory even a tithe of what, at a sacred concert, must inevitably have been paid to pass the outer doors.

THE College of Organists is, we learn, about to hold a Congress of organ-players and organ-builders, with the object of fully discussing possible improvements in organ-building, especially with regard to greater uniformity in the external arrangements of the instrument. On this particular head alone we can certainly testify, from a personal knowledge of various important organs, that there is at present a very great deal to be desired. Great pains have evidently been taken in framing the long paper of questions on the subject, which paper we believe to have been widely circulated amongst organists throughout the kingdom, and we trust, therefore, that equal care may be expended upon each individual set of replies thereto. If this be so, and if, moreover, the numerous firms of organ-builders will consent to profit by the hints they may rely on receiving from many professors amply competent to give them, the Congress can scarcely fail to prove as great a success as it certainly should. The preliminary meeting takes place at the College, on Monday, the 3rd inst., at three p.m.; the general meeting at eight the next evening, and an additional meeting may possibly be held on the following day (Wednesday) at three o'clock in the afternoon.

The award of the first of the yearly scholarships at the Church of England High School for Girls, on the 18th ult., was made interesting by the presence of Professor G. A. Macfarren, who took occasion to deliver an excellent address to the scholars, urging the advantages of a thorough study of music, and showing how, after a period of neglect in this country, the art was now again asserting its importance. He concluded his remarks with a few words of commendation of the Principal of the music school, Miss Macirone, and the staff of teachers. The following prizes were awarded: the Bach Scholarship to Katherine Kingston, and the Beethoven Scholarship to F. Bonham-Carter. Certificates of excellence in the harmony and counterpoint class were gained by Margaret Bingham and Katherine Kingston. The young ladies of the music school played concerted and solo music, the proceedings being varied by a selection of part-songs excellently sung by Mr. Stedman's choir. Madame Antoinette Sterling and Mr. Stedman contributed songs, both these and the part-songs being the composition of Miss Macirone.

THE Tufnell Park Amateur Choral Society gave its first invitation Concert of the season in St. George's Rooms on Thursday evening, the 16th ult., when Gade's "Christmas Eve" and Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles" were performed. The growth in numbers and advance in musical capacity of this young Society are evidences of the ability and popularity of the Conductor, Mr. W. Henry Thomas, and the vocal talent and zeal of the members. The solos were taken by the following members of the Society: Madame Dietz, Misses Price, Tabram, and Philips; Messrs. Alfred Smith, Marten, Grylls, Bridgewater, and G. Harris. Without wishing to individualise, it would be unfair not to mention the important duties well sustained by Miss Philips, the efforts of Madame Dietz, the remarkable freshness and charm of Miss Price's pure soprano voice, and the musicianly help of Mr. Fred. Partridge. Between Gade's and Gadsby's Cantatas Miss Hoare sang with excellent effect Handel's "From mighty kings," and Mr. Lewis Thomas "Honour and arms" from "Samson"; each was recalled to receive honours fairly earned. Miss Trust gave assistance by harp obligatos capitably played.

ON Thursday evening, the 16th ult., the North London Philharmonic Society gave a Concert at St. Andrew's Hall, Newman Street, Oxford Street, to a large and appreciative audience. The first part was devoted to Mr. J. F. Barnett's Cantata, "The Building of the Ship," which was so successfully produced at the late Leeds Musical Festival. The chorus was furnished by the Society, and the orchestra of nearly forty performers, led by Mr. E. Halfpenny, included many well-known names. The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Madame Poole, Miss E. Atkins, Miss E. Gibson, Herr E. Theisen, Mr. T. Hanson, and Mr. Frank Ward. The second part of the Concert, consisting of a miscellaneous selection, included songs by the principal vocalists, part-songs by the chorus, a Gavotte, "Phillis," by Dr. Hiles (first time in London), the Larghetto from Beethoven's Second Symphony, and Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante in B minor, the solo part of the last-named piece being finely played by Mr. Yeatman. Mr. Henry J. B. Dart was the Conductor.

ON Tuesday, November 30, the first Concert of the third season was given by the Kilburn Musical Association to a large and appreciative audience. The first part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants" and "Hear my prayer," and a pianoforte solo (encored) brilliantly played by Mr. H. Baumer. The solos were excellently rendered by Madame Liebhart, and the choruses were sung with a vigour and artistic finish which showed that the members are anxious to enhance the already high reputation of the Association. The second part, which was miscellaneous, included Gollmick's "Parting," well sung by the choir, two Tyrolese melodies by Mesdames Liebhart and Emes, Barnby's "When the tide comes in" by Miss Allitsen, a duet for two pianos, successfully played by Miss Holfeld and Miss Gollmick, and a violoncello solo by Mr. T. Liebe. Miss Gollmick presided at the piano, and Mr. A. Gollmick conducted.

UNDER the conductorship of Mr. F. Sydney Miller, choirmaster of St. Jude's Church, Mildmay Park, a very successful Musical Entertainment was given in the Memorial School-room, King Henry's Walk, on Monday evening, the 6th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of glees and songs, the second part comprising chiefly anthem music, the efficient rendering of which by the St. Jude's Institute Choral Society was thoroughly appreciated. Two instrumental duets were performed by Messrs. W. McCluer, and F. S. Miller; W. McCluer and D. J. D. Codner. The anthems "Praise the Lord, O my soul" (Goss) and "Blessed be the God and Father" (Wesley), were given in a manner which reflected great credit upon the Choral Society and its Conductor. The accompanists were Mr. McCluer, Organist of Ram's Episcopal Chapel, Homerton (harmonium), and Mr. Codner, Organist of St. Jude's (pianoforte).

AT South Norwood Wesleyan Chapel, on Thursday evening the 9th ult., the newly erected organ by Messrs. Bishop and Sons of Marylebone Road, London, was opened by Mr. Alfred Rhodes, Organist of the Rev. Baldwin Brown's Church, Brixton. The organist presided with his usual ability; and a choir of seventy voices sang several anthems and hymns in a highly efficient manner. The organ has two manuals, contains fourteen stops, three couplers, and five composition pedals, preparation having been made for seven additional stops as soon as the necessary funds are forthcoming. The tone of the instrument is very much admired; and the whole of the work has been executed in a manner which reflects great credit upon the builders. On Sunday the 12th ult. the opening services were continued, when two sermons were preached by the Rev. E. Lightwood.

MR. HENRY LESLIE has evidently not been idle during his temporary retirement, for an announcement has reached us that, with the co-operation of a large number of landed proprietors in the vicinity of Mr. Leslie's estate (which is situated at Llansantffraid), he is about establishing classes for instruction in vocal music, and it is anticipated that eventually, by the union of these village choirs once a year, he may be enabled to hold a Festival in Oswestry with a choir of about 1000 voices. The Oswestry School of Music, of which Mr. Leslie is President, has now been established more than a year; and there can be little doubt that if the organisation of these choirs (admission to which it is proposed shall be free) should extend as widely as it is hoped, Mr. Leslie will have effected as much good amongst the country people as he has already done in the metropolis.

DR. ARTHUR EDWIN DYER, Music-master at Cheltenham College and Conductor of the Cheltenham Musical Society, took his degree of Doctor in Music on the 9th ult. On Wednesday the 8th, he conducted a performance of his degree exercise, "Salvator Mundi," in the Sheldonian Theatre, before a crowded audience. The solos (ably rendered by Miss Anna Williams, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Frederick King) were much admired, and, with several other numbers in the work, received considerable applause. The singing of the choir reflected much credit on the Cheltenham Musical Society; and if the band was only fairly satisfactory at times, it must be remembered that the performers had met for a first rehearsal only two hours before the Concert. Mr. A. Burnett was the leader.

THE annual performance of Handel's "Messiah," by the advanced choir of the South London Choral Association, was given at its Institute of Music, Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on Tuesday the 14th ult. The principal parts were successfully interpreted by Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Marion Burton, Mr. Dudley Thomas, and Mr. Thurley Beale, all of whom elicited warm expressions of approval from the numerous audience. The choral numbers were without exception admirably treated; and the uniform precision and efficiency displayed were well worthy of the Society's increasing reputation. Mr. Windeyer Clark and Mr. W. H. Harper presided at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively. Mr. Leonard C. Venables conducted.

HANDEL'S "Messiah" was performed in Bloomsbury Chapel, on Wednesday the 8th ult., in aid of the Domestic Mission, and again proved the never-failing helpmate of charity. The choir consisted of a hundred voices, and, under the direction of Mr. George Carr, sang the choruses with considerable effect. The soloists were Miss Agnes Larkcom (soprano), Miss Gertrude Lewis (contralto), Mr. A. Kenningham (tenor), and Mr. R. Hilton (bass). The capabilities of these vocalists are well known, excepting, perhaps, those of Miss Lewis, who, though comparatively unknown, made a great impression, by the freshness of her voice and her style of singing, in "He shall feed his flock" and "He was despised." Mr. Norman Carr presided at the organ in an able manner.

A MUSICAL performance by the pupils of the London Society for Teaching the Blind was given at the Institution, Upper Avenue Road, Regent's Park, on the 10th ult., under the able direction of Mr. Edwin Barnes, Professor of Music at the Society's Schools. The programme was excellently selected, and well rendered throughout; Mr. Charles E. Stephens, who occupied the chair, at the conclusion of the proceedings paying a well-deserved compliment both to the performers and their indefatigable Conductor. As a proof of the good effected at the Institution, we may mention that Mr. Price, one of the most talented of the pupils who took part in the Concert, is engaged as teacher of music at the Blind School in Plymouth.

THE members of the St. John's Choral Society, attached to the church of St. John, Upper Holloway, gave the first Concert of the fourth season on Friday evening, November 26, in the presence of an audience which filled the spacious schools. The work performed was Sterndale Bennett's Cantata "The Woman of Samaria," the solos being intrusted to Madame Worrell, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. C. A. White, and Mr. H. Pope. The unaccompanied quartet, "God is a spirit," was encored, and some of the choruses, which on the whole went well, met with hearty manifestations of approval. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. Mr. Beardwell conducted, and Mr. Manly was the accompanist.

THE appointment of Mr. George Watts to the General Managership of the Brighton Aquarium will, we are certain, prove highly beneficial to that Institution; for not only has he a large experience as a musical entrepreneur, but his energy as a man of business is well-known to the inhabitants of the town. His cultivated taste and general knowledge of the musical requirements of the Brighton public will enable him not only to carry forward the good work already commenced at the Aquarium, but still further to increase the artistic value of those permanent Concerts which are now amongst the most prominent attractions of this favourite watering-place.

AN Organ Recital was given in Christ Church, Westminster Road, on November 25, by Mr. F. G. Edwards, Organist and Director of the Choir. Other instrumental music (violin and harp) was introduced, the combination of these instruments with the organ producing a very pleasing effect. Vocal music was given by Madame Florence Lancia and Mr. A. J. Mayers. The programme included (for organ) Concerto in D minor, Handel; Prelude and Fugue in C, Bach; Andante in A flat, Haydn; Handel's Largo, for violin, harp, and organ; and Gounod's "Ave Maria," for voice, violin, harp, and organ. There was a large and appreciative audience.

ON Wednesday evening, the 1st ult., a Service of Sacred Music was given in Kensington Presbyterian Church (Rev. D. MacColl's), under the conductorship of Mr. Sinclair Dunn, R.A.M. An admirably selected programme of anthems and solos from the works of Handel, Mendelssohn, Gounod, Macfarren, &c., was effectively rendered by the church choir, assisted by several students of the Royal Academy of Music. The soloists were Miss H. Macleod, Miss E. Hall, Miss F. Little, Mr. Dunn, Mr. B. Pierpoint, R.A.M., and Mr. R. H. Cummings. Miss M. MacColl presided at the harmonium, and Mr. W. G. Wood, R.A.M., efficiently accompanied the soloists on the pianoforte.

THE London Gregorian Choral Association held its Annual Meeting on Thursday evening, the 9th ult., in the Hall of Sion College, Earl Beauchamp, the President of the Association, presiding. In the course of the evening it was announced by the Treasurer that the Association had undertaken the publication of new Masses, shortly to be followed by the complete collection of Sarum hymns and old office hymns, which would again see the light of day in the English Church, and be brought before Church people at large. At the conclusion of the business meeting, a Lecture on Plain-song was delivered by the Rev. H. Walter Miller, Mus. Bac., Oxon.

THE usual monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society was given at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday, the 17th ult. The first part consisted of sacred solos and choruses, chiefly selected from "Elijah," "Judas Macabæus," and "Jephtha." In the second part a comic Cantata, "Jack and the Beanstalk," by Edmund Rogers, was very successfully rendered, the principal vocalists being Mrs. Luff, Miss Lizzie Turner, Messrs. Arthur Weston, and W. Lloyd. Miss Florence Hartley accompanied. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. G. R. Egerton.

ON Tuesday the 7th ult. a Concert was given at St. Saviour's Mission Hall, Fleet Road, in aid of the funds of the Soup Kitchen, Weedington Road, N.W. The performances included pianoforte solos and duets by the Misses A. and B. Walton and the Misses Blockley. The part-songs, "When Evening's Twilight" and "The Tar's Song" (Hatton), "The Happiest Land" and "The Brook" (Farmer), were excellently rendered. The vocalists were the Misses Blockley, Mr. J. H. Jones, Mr. W. L. Hodgson, and Mr. A. Thompson. Mr. J. Blockley, jun., conducted.

THE Dedication Festival of the church of St. Andrew's, Wells Street, was observed on Tuesday, November 30. The most important feature was the solemn dedication, by the Bishop of London, of a peal of eight bells recently presented to the church by a lady. The peal, which weighs seventy-six hundred-weight, the tenor alone being twenty-one hundred-weight, has been cast by Mr. T. C. Lewis, of Brixton, and is in the key of E flat. In the evening about 250 members of the congregation, together with clergy and choir, partook of supper in St. James's Hall.

THE Blackheath Musical Society put forth an excellent programme on the occasion of the first Subscription Concert for 1880-81, on November 30. The works performed were Bach's "Blessing, glory, wisdom," and Schubert's "Song of Miriam." A varied selection of songs and part-songs, together with pianoforte and violin solos completed an interesting Concert. The artists were Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Frank Boyle, and Mr. W. Webster, jun. (vocalists); M. Musin (violin), and Mr. G. F. Geaussen (piano), the last-named also officiating as Conductor. Mr. J. T. Field and Mr. Litchfield Morley were the accompanists.

AN Orchestral Service was held on the evening of Advent Sunday at St. Michael and All Angels, North Kensington, the chief feature being the performance of Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" in the place of the anthem. The orchestra and organ were also combined in the opening voluntary (Gounod's "Meditation") and in the accompaniment of the canticles. The vocal portions of the service were well rendered by the choir of the church, under the conductorship of Mr. Sidney Naylor, the organist and choirmaster; Mr. T. L. Forbes being at the organ.

SIR HERBERT OAKELEY, Professor of Music in the University of Edinburgh, has consented to visit Aberdeen and take part in the Annual Concert of the Students of the University this session. The University Choral Society received no slight impetus from the countenance and assistance given to it two or three years ago by the Professor, and this renewed mark of his interest shows how thoroughly he has at heart the advancement of the art in Scotland.

ON the 8th ult., at St. John the Evangelist, Smith Square, Westminster, John Farmer's Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers" was sung at the usual Wednesday evening service by an augmented choir, including the Westminster Abbey choristers. The solos were taken by Miss Dickenson, Masters Bowes and Ould, and Messrs Barrett and Orme. Mrs. Bennett, the organist of the church, presided at the organ, and at the conclusion of the service played Mendelssohn's Fourth Organ Sonata.

A PERFORMANCE of Handel's "Messiah" was given at the Northfield Hall, Highgate, on the 14th ult., in aid of the local Soup Kitchen. There was a band and chorus of a hundred performers. The principals were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Margaret Hancock, Mr. T. W. Hanson, and Mr. Winn; Mr. T. Harper (trumpet), M. Victor Buziau (leader), and Mr. Edwin Bending (harmonium). Mr. Worsley Staniforth conducted.

A CONCERT was given at the Assembly Rooms, Bow, on Friday the 3rd ult., by Mr. Edward Bromell before a highly appreciative audience. The vocalists were Miss Agnes Tiffin, Miss Harriette Falconar, Mr. C. E. Ellison, and Mr. Leonard Barnes. Flute and violin solos were contributed by Mr. W. A. Dobson and Mr. G. Newman. The concert-giver was solo pianist and shared the duties of accompanist with Miss Gertrude Salmon.

A HANDSOME silver loving-cup, bearing the following inscription, was recently presented to Mr. William Frankland by the tenors of Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir: "Presented to Mr. William Frankland, by the tenors of Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, as a mark of sincere respect and esteem as their Superintendent during a period of fifteen years.—November 19, 1880."

THE "Messiah" was sung in the Green Lanes Wesleyan Chapel, Highbury, on the 16th ult. The soloists were Madame Ernst, Mrs. Bradshawe McKay, Mr. H. Guy, and Mr. W. G. Forington. Mr. Fountain Meen presided at the organ, and Mr. C. J. Dale conducted.

THE body of gentlemen amateurs known as the South London Musical Club, gave their ninth private Concert at Angell Town Institution, Brixton, on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult., before a large audience. The programme comprised vocal solos by Mrs. Charles Black, Messrs. G. R. Bonnard and E. G. Richardson, part-music by a choir of male voices, under the direction of Mr. Charles Stevens, and pianoforte solos by Mr. C. E. Clarke.

THE Oratorios after evening service at St. Ethelburga's, Bishopsgate Street, are being continued, that announced for the 26th ult., being the portion of the "Messiah" more especially bearing on the Nativity. Farmer's "Christ and His Soldiers" will be sung on the 2nd inst., and during Epiphany Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" will be given. The choir is under the direction of Mr. Stedman, and Mr. E. M. Lott is organist.

ON Sunday evening, the 5th ult., Mr. A. E. Bishop (organist of St. Mary Abchurch, City) gave a Recital on the new organ, by Brindley and Foster, at Holy Trinity, Brompton. A well-selected programme from the works of Bach, Mendelssohn, Merkel, Guilman, &c., besides an Andante Pastorale by Mr. Bishop, were excellently rendered. The organ has three manuals and thirty-nine stops.

THE following gentlemen have consented to act as Examiners for the higher Musical Examinations at Trinity College, London, during the present month: The Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., M.A., Mus. D., Sir Herbert Oakeley, M.A., Mus. D., Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. Barnby, Mr. E. J. Hopkins, Dr. A. H. Mann, Dr. Gordon Saunders, Dr. Steggall, and Mr. E. H. Turpin.

MENDELSSOHN'S "Hymn of Praise" formed the central feature of a special service held at St. Stephen's, Lewisham, on the evening of Saturday, the 18th ult. Besides the organ, at which Mr. George C. Martin presided, the amateur orchestra, which on high festivals usually accompanies the ordinary services, was employed; and the whole was conducted by Mr. C. Warwick Jordan.

A MUSICAL and elocutionary performance, partially in aid of St. Mary's Institute, was given in the School-room, Wyndham Place, Bryanston Square, on Wednesday evening, the 15th ult. The musical portion of the programme was contributed by Misses Ferguson and E. Phillips, Messrs. Arthur Glazier, W. E. Glazier, Morris, Foote, Blackman, Weston, and Haes (zither).

THE degree of Bachelor of Music in Trinity College, Dublin, has been conferred on Mr. Frank Bates, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Baldred's, North Berwick, and Mr. John Francis Fitzgerald, Organist of St. Mary's, Clonmel. The examiners were the Rev. Professor Mahaffy and Sir R. P. Stewart.

THE 143rd Anniversary Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians will take place at St. James's Hall, on Thursday, February 10, under the presidency of H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught. Several eminent artists have promised their valuable assistance on the occasion.

MR. FARMER'S Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers" was performed in the City Temple, on the 14th ult., by the Choral Society in connection with that church. Herr Pollitzer was leader of the band, Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ, and Mr. E. Minshall conducted.

THE Blackheath Amateur Vocal and Instrumental Society gave Dr. Bridge's Cantata "Boadicea" on November 25. The soloists, with the exception of Miss Grace Maile, were amateurs. There was an excellent band, and the work was well received.

THE St. Pancras Choral Society gave a Concert of Sacred and Secular Music at Lancing Street, Euston Square, on the 15th ult. The members of the Society were assisted by Miss Ada Tolkien, and Mr. Wallace Wells was the Conductor and Accompanist.

THE following have been admitted to the degree of Doctor in Music of the University of Oxford: W. Creser (New College and Scarborough), A. E. Dyer (unattached and Cheltenham).

BACH'S "Christmas Oratorio" will be given in Westminster Abbey on Wednesday evening, the 19th inst., with the usual band and chorus.

REVIEWS.

The Last Judgment. An Oratorio composed by Louis Spohr. English version by Edward Taylor. Full Score. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IF the number of orchestral scores issued every year by German publishing firms be taken into account, it certainly appears a most surprising thing that the full score of Spohr's greatest sacred work should have remained in manuscript for more than half a century after its composition. "The Last Judgment" ("Die Letzten Dinge," to give it its original German title) was written by Spohr for Vienna, and was first produced in that city in 1826. According to Dr. Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," it was first heard in England at the Norwich festival of 1830; and in this country, perhaps even more than in Germany, it has always maintained its position on our concert and festival répertoires.

It is superfluous to say one word on the musical merits of a work so well known and so generally admired as "The Last Judgment"; our present business is merely with the orchestration. It can scarcely be said that Spohr's instrumentation has an individual colour of its own in the same sense in which this may be affirmed of Weber or Mendelssohn; nevertheless the score of "The Last Judgment" is one which students may consult, not only with much pleasure, but with great advantage. Spohr's colouring is rich even to sensuousness; but it is full of delightful details, and shows a most intimate acquaintance not merely with the capabilities, but with what we may term the genius of each instrument. The tone he obtains from the complete orchestra is full and sonorous rather than brilliant; it is in the happy combination and contrast of single instruments that he excels. We may refer to such passages as the points of imitation for the wood wind in the overture (score, pp. 14, 15, and 26, 27), to a somewhat similar effect in the recitative "And lo! a mighty host" (pp. 80 and 82), and to the whole of the duet "Forsake me not," as illustrating this point. As a beautiful piece of delicate scoring may be instanced the finale of the first part, "Lord God of heaven," accompanied by muted strings, clarinets, bassoons, horns, and drums, which is full of charming combinations. But, in fact, there are few numbers in the work which do not present some points worthy of notice.

The score is most beautifully engraved and printed, and appears to be singularly free from errors. We think it a pity that the now almost obsolete name "Clarini" should have been retained for the trumpets instead of the more usual "Trombe"; and also that the old-fashioned spelling "Tympani" should be frequently used in place of the more modern "Timpani." As the latter form is employed several times in the score (pp. 1, 60, 62, 67, 94, 128) it is difficult to see why "Tympani" should appear on pp. 85, 164, 166, 200, and 201. These, of course, are comparatively very unimportant matters, but uniformity would certainly have been desirable.

On Musical Education. By Alberto B. Bach. [William Blackwood and Sons.]

THIS book contains three lectures, the first "On the Cultivation of the Voice," the second "On Musical Culture," and the third "On the Registers of the Voice." The lecture treating of the cultivation of the vocal organs was delivered at the Royal Academy of Music in June last, but in illustration (as was recorded in THE MUSICAL TIMES) of an instrument invented by the lecturer, called the "Resonator," for increasing the volume and power of the voice when singing. No mention of this instrument occurs in the published lecture, so that whether Signor Bach has abandoned it, and intends for the future to rely upon a systematic training of the voice without artificial aid, or cares not to mix up his thoughtful paper with an advertisement, we are left to conjecture. Be this as it may, his remarks upon the art of singing are extremely good, and evidently the result of much practical knowledge. "It is a great mistake," he says, "to take for the first lessons an inexperienced teacher, because, perhaps, he is less expensive; and this is particularly the case with singing, since the voice is but too often ruined for ever by mismanagement, or the pupil falls into bad habits, which require great loss of time and labour to be got rid of." Respecting the matter of "breathing" we have some valuable hints; and the author, very truly, as we think, cites Madame Adelina Patti as an artist who especially excels in this important portion of vocal culture. "Breath," he tells us, "must be drawn completely at ease, without fits and starts, and quite noiselessly, until even the lowest part of the lungs are completely filled with air. Many persons spoil their very first note by singing it over-hastily, even before they are done drawing a breath; whilst the formation of the tone must begin only with the expiration, which likewise must be executed with the greatest possible ease and gentleness. It does not depend on the great volume of the ejected air. On the contrary, too much breath makes the note uncertain and unsteady. Flat singing is generally due to this mistake." The second lecture, on Musical Culture, is also headed "How can the Musical Education of the Middle Classes be improved?" but as the author's observations are exclusively confined to the proper method of teaching singing, it would be good, we think, to alter the title of the paper. We can, of course, have no objection to the author's giving only the result of his experience as a vocalist; but we do take exception to the statement of his reason for so doing. After saying that singing is the basis of all music, and quoting the remark that "Song is seated on the throne as king, and all the instruments bow before it as its vassals," he proceeds thus: "I am sorry I have to add that, in recent times, these vassals have thrown off their allegiance. They have risen in rebellion, and want no king to reign over them. If we look to the foundation of this phenomenon, we find it but natural that things should have gone thus. As long as the king was of noble mind and cherished a beneficent sway, the vassals obeyed and honoured him; but as the king grew of depraved tastes, and neglectful of his high office, the vassals grew disloyal, and followed their own evil courses." Now surely this is a remarkable instance of "begging the question." Might it not be more truly said that seeing the king was bent upon assuming despotic power, the vassals, who had long felt their true position in the artistic kingdom, were resolved to submit no longer to mere serfdom, and therefore resolved openly to claim their rights and privileges? Song has indeed too long ruled the world of music; and it is now time to assert the eloquence of purely "abstract" instrumental compositions, and also to help in freeing instruments from their place as attendants upon the voice, and elevating them into its intellectual and sympathetic companions. Signor Bach's lecture, therefore, upon "Musical Culture," must be called on "Vocal Culture," and then we shall have no fault to find with it. His observations upon "Choral Unions," are indeed applicable to many country choirs; and we can only hope that, with the spread of music, the evil may be remedied. "Everybody," he says, "who has but a little bit of a voice is only too gladly received; and if it be a strong voice, though without a trace of musical culture, so much the better! Then generally the singers with feeble voices strive to cope with those with strong voices. And what is the result of such efforts? Screaming and shouting, but no singing!" Of course it often happens that local influence has very much to do with the reception of members into a choral body; but with the advance of education it is more than probable that these persons will either know their incapacity for such a position, or study until they are fitted for it. At all events it is the duty of a Conductor to uphold the dignity of his art as far as lies in his power, and in doing this, he should feel that he has the support of those who have selected him for the office. Little need be said concerning the third lecture in the book under notice, which deals only with the "Registers of the Voice," and contains powerful arguments to prove that there are "no notes produced in the head." Who shall decide this matter when so many clever doctors disagree?

Pianoforte Playing to Highest Perfection; being a Short Treatise on the Right way of attaining the above accomplishment. By A. Hoering. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

REVIEWERS have an unfortunate duty to perform; for, as every author imagines that, although other works may be passed over, his imperatively demands a notice, it is not likely that, however fair-dealing the critic may appear to himself, he will appear at all so to others. We have unfortunately so many books on our table professing to teach both practical and theoretical music in the right way (which of course means the authors' way) that we should have been disposed—merely judging from its somewhat pretentious title—to conclude, before opening it, that the work before us was one of those issued by a teacher merely with the view of extending his connection, and consequently not likely to force itself into general circulation. Although, however, written by a teacher (who, by the way, carefully gives us his address and his terms at the end of the book) it shows the result of such good and systematic thought as at least to challenge criticism upon its merits. The author must not be astonished if he is misunderstood; and with the kindest feeling we should counsel him to reconsider whether it is good to head the opening of his work with a title so absurd as "The Royal Road to Perfection in Pianoforte Playing," especially as he must know by experience that no "perfection" can be attained by a person who has not exceptionally great natural qualifications, and that with these gifts, no "Royal Road" is necessary. Divested of all the preliminary observations upon "intellect" and "talent," which would lead us to suppose that the author had made some extraordinary discoveries upon the subject, we are disposed to accept his rules for practice as highly valuable. For example, he says, in speaking of playing the scales, "Unless we have a distinct object in view, unless we feel the benefit of each practice of the scales daily, there will be little encouragement even for the most enthusiastic. It is too common an error to consider the practice of scales and finger-exercises merely as a necessary evil for the purpose of overcoming technical difficulties. Altogether the training of the fingers is too often considered as a separate branch of musical study, to be entirely gone through without the assistance of the intellectual faculties of the student; and no wonder, then, that no better results are obtained." All this is very true, if not very new; but the following is still better: "Not a single passage must be practised without at the same time improving and training our faculty of conception. We must learn to see with the 'inner eye,' so to speak, better and better day-by-day. And to lay a good foundation for this kind of practice we must, above all, begin every day anew, as if we had never yet understood our subject before, and wanted only then to get a thorough understanding of it. By these means we shall gradually learn to see things which we never dreamed of before, and we shall soon discover that this alone must be the right way to the desired end. One of the first results, and at the same time the most important, of such practice we shall find to be quite an unexpected facility of playing from memory those passages first which we merely practised for the sake of overcoming technical difficulties; and, moreover, we shall find that quite a natural facility, not one that is obtained by trying to remember what we play." We have said that the author of the book is likely to be misunderstood; but the fault rests with himself: his intentions are extremely good, and many of his directions to students, as we have shown, are excellent; but if he will tell us that "up to this day there is yet much darkness on this subject," and term his Essay a description of a musical journey, divided into three distinct paragraphs, "The Consideration of the Outfit; the Consideration of the best and most economical route; and the Real start and progress"—he must not be surprised if his remarks do not carry that weight which they would certainly do if conveyed in more dignified style.

Templeton and Malibran. Reminiscences of these Renowned Singers; with original Letters and Anecdotes. Edited by W. H. H. [William Reeves.]

WE question whether Mr. Templeton (who was an excellent singer in his day) will care to have the notices which are reprinted in this book, placed before the many who, thoroughly acquainted with the great Malibran, have never, perhaps, even heard his name. Here, for example, is a portion of one from the New Orleans Picayune, upon a lecture given by Mr. Templeton. After saying that he was tall and of a florid complexion, with a light eye and a good wig, a brown dress-coat, figured velvet vest, and black pants, white kids and patent leathers, the critic proceeds thus: "He bowed unlike an actor, but like a gentleman. He was quite self-possessed, and looked as if he tho't he should please his audience. He opened his MS. note-book, and then glanced steadily around the house, as if he would say, 'Now, if you are ready, I am, and will begin.' The audience understood the look, settled themselves comfortably into their seats, and listened." Then he sings "Sally, in our Alley," and the writer continues his remarks: "No man would dare to sneeze in such a silence as reigned during the first verse, and fifty men might sneeze unheard in the enthusiastic burst of applause that followed the last note of the verse. While he sings they listen entranced; when he ceases they shake the building with applause and 'Encore! Encore!' resounds, until even echo, awakened by the shout, cries out 'Encore.'" Of such panegyrics as these is this volume made up; and if Mr. Templeton, therefore, is not proved to be as great a vocalist as the compiler of the book would desire, it certainly is not his fault. But we fail to see the object of the production of such a work. Malibran, when she came to this country, found Mr. Templeton the best tenor procurable, and was too glad, therefore, to accept him as her stage-lover; but that she worked hard to inoculate him with a portion of her own dramatic power, and even pinched him occasionally in the hope of stirring him into something like a passion on the stage, are matters well known to all who remember those days; and to those who do not, such reminiscences can have but little interest. Madame Malibran has only a small share in the book; and that portion devoted to her is chiefly occupied with extracts from her correspondence with Mr. Bunn; most of her letters, however, almost exclusively treating of subjects which can scarcely command public attention—such as the haggling about money transactions, and the refusal to sing certain parts which were submitted to her. "I would willingly," she says, in one of her letters, "accept your offer to play the Sonnambula in English for one night, but on the terms of two hundred and fifty pounds sterling, payable on the morning of the representation. I thought it right to let you know at once my intentions, so as not to lose time in correspondence and meetings, which would in no wise change my views." This is certainly a business letter, and very much to the purpose; but the writer could, we think, hardly expect that it would be reproduced in a book professedly devoted to a review of her artistic career. All who like to look back to the time when Opera in English was struggling to maintain a position before the lovers of music in this country, will doubtless like to read something about a tenor who, to a certain extent, helped on the good work; but there can be but little doubt that this volume would never have been published had the compiler not been able to couple the name of Templeton with that of Malibran. In every respect the work is well got up; and three portraits—two of Templeton, and one of Malibran—are good enough to be preserved apart from the book.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, in F. By Charles Edward Stephens. Op. 23.

"The Lord hear thee." Anthem in eight parts, by Hamilton Clarke. [Weekes and Co.]

THE Music sung at each recurring Festival of the London Church Choir Association is composed expressly for the occasion, and the above works were written for the eighth festival, on November 4 last. By this regulation the Association enlarges its sphere of usefulness, for we may reasonably look for some valuable additions to our store of service music from time to time. Mr. C. E. Stephens is recognised as one of the best of living English musicians, and it is needless to say that his setting of the evening canticles is marked by sound musicianship. The eighteen bars of symphony, in which a bold figure is used sequentially, at once proclaim the festive character of the service; and this is maintained until the end of the fourth verse. The composer adopts time-honoured precedent in setting the fifth verse as a quartet or semi-chorus; and also in the fugato to the words, "He hath scattered the proud." The crashing chords and chromatic passages in the accompaniment to the latter are very effective. After another quartet in B flat, a progression is made to the dominant harmony of D, in which key the original figure returns, leading by a fine crescendo back to F, for the entrance of the "Gloria." The second verse of this savours rather of flippancy, but the close is at least pompous, if not dignified. The Nunc dimittis opens quietly, and nothing worthy of note occurs until the last verse, when the basses again introduce the initial figure or leit motif. The Gloria is the same as before. On the whole, this is a vigorous and excellent Service, and its difficulties are by no means great. Mr. Clarke's anthem opens with a suave flowing chorus in 3-2 time. The second A in the accompaniment of the thirteenth bar of page two, is obviously a misprint for F, and in the seventeenth bar of the same page, the progression from the leading note triad to the 6-4 on the dominant is open to objection. In this movement the voices are in four parts, but in the succeeding chorus, "We will rejoice in Thy salvation," they are employed antiphonally, though with but little contrapuntal elaboration. A cursory analysis again reveals great laxity in the part-writing, as, for example, the consecutive fifths between first tenor and bass, four bars before the end. The treble solo which follows, is the most pleasing portion of the anthem. In the last chorus there is a fugato in four parts, and the work ends with seventeen bars lento, the voices being subdivided and almost unaccompanied. Mr. Clarke's anthem cannot be considered a great success, the technical blemishes being untoned for by any exceptional interest in the musical ideas.

Popular Classics for the Pianoforte. Selected, Edited, and Fingered by Walter Macfarren. Sixth Series.

[Ashdown and Parry.]

OUR prediction respecting the success of these excellent extracts from the works of the classical pianoforte writers has been thoroughly verified. There are many amateurs who are willing enough to test their power of performing the standard compositions, provided they can have a list of such pieces selected for them by a competent authority, from which they can choose according to their taste. The Sixth Series, now before us, commences at No. 61 and ends at No. 72. From Beethoven we have the Bagatelle in E flat—perhaps one of the most popular of these charming trifles—the variations on "Quant'è più Bella," and the "Andante" in F; from Mendelssohn the "Two Sketches," and "Variations Sérieuses"; from Weber the last movement of the Sonata, Op. 24, known as "Il moto continuo"; from Schumann the "Schlummerlied"; from Hummel the "Capriccio" in F; from Schubert the Menuetto in B minor (from Op. 78); from Handel the Variations on "The Harmonious Blacksmith"—in which we are glad to find that the original time, 24-16, has been retained where the semiquaver triplets occur; from Clementi the Sonata in B flat (Op. 38, No. 2); and from Dussek the "Rondo Scherzo" (from the Sonata, Op. 45, No. 1). There has been much discrimination shown in the choice of these works, for they are so varied in style that we can quite imagine a purchaser, beginning by selecting from the number, will end by taking the entire set. We sincerely hope that the work will be steadily continued; and shall be glad if the next Series were to include some of the standard pianoforte duets.

The Paragraph Psalter, arranged for the use of Choirs. By the Rev. Dr. Westcott, Canon of Peterborough.

[Cambridge University Press.]

THERE are so many Psalters in vogue at present, some of which have obtained such a sure footing, that the Editor of a new one must advance some decidedly original and equally good arrangement before he can hope that his book will meet with anything like success. The object of the above Psalter is (as its name suggests) to divide the Psalms into paragraphs, grouping the verses together as we should sentences in any literary publication. Dr. Westcott informs us in his preface that the Psalter has been used with success at Peterborough Cathedral during the last six years, and his own words will best explain his reasons for publishing the work. "Sometimes," he says, "the verses are separately complete; sometimes they are arranged in couplets, sometimes in triplets; sometimes they are grouped in unequal but corresponding masses. . . . If, therefore, the Psalms are sung antiphonally on one method in single verses, or in pairs of verses or half verses, the sense must constantly be sacrificed, and the music, instead of illuminating the thought, will fatally obscure it." As we know of no Psalter which aims at this arrangement, we commend it to the notice of choir-masters, feeling sure that they will find in it much that is useful and instructive. Dr. Westcott appears to have spared no pains either in carrying out his own theory or in the "pointing" of the verses.

Zwölf Charakteristische Studien für Pianoforte zur Beförderung der Technik und des Vortrags. Von Albert Biehl. Op. 70. [Hamburg and Kiel: Hugo Thieme.]

THE more general use of Technical Studies for the pianoforte is one of the most important signs of the healthy progress of musical education in this country. Teachers are beginning to see that before a pupil can play he must be taught how to play, and that this can only be effectually accomplished by the constant use of well considered exercises, written by artists who have thoroughly mastered their instrument, and who resolve to act as guides to those who desire to travel the same road. In spite of the many excellent studies now in general use in England, there is plenty of room for more; and we cordially extend the hand of welcome therefore to Herr Biehl's "Charakteristische Studien," which are published in two parts, each containing six pieces. No. 2, in B minor; No. 5, in A major; No. 7, in B flat minor; No. 9, in D flat major (a remarkably good study for octaves); and No. 11, in B major, may be especially commended for earnest practice. In No. 4, we cannot reconcile ourselves to the bare perfect fifths which occur in the right hand passages; but, apart from this, the Study will be found extremely useful.

Der Kreisler (Child's Top) Walzer Caprice, für Piano.
Grand Galop Brillant, pour Piano.
Reverie, für Piano.

Von Albert Werner.

[Dresden: Plötner and Meinhold.]

WE have selected these three pieces from others by the same writer, which have been forwarded to us, as fair specimens of the talent of a composer who writes for his instrument both with fluency and elegance. The Waltz ("Child's Top") is based upon an appropriately whirling subject, which will give some good work, even for exceptionally agile fingers; and will assuredly, if well-played, win the good opinion of all listeners. The Galop is even better; the second theme, in the sub-dominant, being extremely melodious, and contrasting effectively with the spirited opening subject. The Reverie (in the somewhat unusual "Reverie" key of B major) is charming, both in the theme and its treatment. The syncopated figure in the left hand is most effective, and enforces the tender eloquence of the principal melody throughout the piece. The versatility of style shown in these slight pieces makes us hope to meet Herr Werner in some compositions of more importance.

Organ Pieces for Church Use. By Boyton Smith.
[Novello, Ewer & Co.]

THIS is a series of compositions published in four books, each containing three or four pieces. We think that the composer has in this instance successfully supplied a want, for most organists will allow that they have not too many short and truly melodious pieces suitable for voluntaries, upon which they can readily lay their hands. Mr. Boyton Smith does not confine himself to one style, some of these pieces being distinctly "light," while others are of a solemn and dignified character. The music is always graceful and attractive, and will doubtless be in the possession of a great number of organists; in fact, we think there is much popularity in store for this work.

A Century of Hymn-Tunes. Composed by Arthur Henry Brown. [Thos. Bosworth.]

MR. BROWN, in his preface, says that many of the hymn-tunes in this book were written for a friend to whom the "Century" was dedicated; and that their success has induced the composer to publish them in the form of a book. To those persons who are looking out for new tunes, the present collection must be considered very valuable, as it contains many which deserve to become popular; and those who know any of Mr. Brown's former compositions of this kind, will, of course, be anxious to make themselves acquainted with this little work. In our opinion, many of these tunes rank with the best of any of the composer's former efforts.

The Professional Pocket Book; or, Daily and Hourly Engagement Diary for 1881. Published under the immediate superintendence of Sir Julius Benedict.

[Rudall, Carte and Co.]

THE announcement of the publication of this useful pocket book must be coupled with some expression of regret that notices of the meetings of several scientific societies, which have previously appeared under the proper dates, are omitted from the present issue. As the work is under the superintendence of Sir Julius Benedict, it may be possible that only musical events are in future to be mentioned; but, if so, the "Professional Pocket Book" is too comprehensive a title.

Original Compositions for the Organ. By C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., &c. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE are glad to see the three new numbers of the above which have just been sent us. Without going into details, we are able to say that they are all distinctly interesting movements, and being of a generally quiet character, will be found very useful for opening voluntaries. Mr. Jordan in his writing shows that he has a true appreciation of the style of music to which Henry Smart contributed; at the same time he shows an equal leaning towards the school of which E. Batiste is a representative. Mr. Jordan has, however, contrived to blend the two styles with considerable taste and ingenuity.

Remember now thy Creator. Composed by Arthur Grünen. [Weekes and Co.]

THIS song has so much real sacred feeling that we are led to anticipate even better works from its composer, who may here be cautioned, in the most friendly spirit, not to be tempted into wandering through keys in search of effect which, with more self-reliance, he might find with less effort. We are particularly pleased with the Allegretto, to the theme of which the semiquaver arpeggio accompaniment is most appropriate; and the return to the original subject is most happy. We commend this song to the attention of expressive singers; and trust that with this specimen of his power we may not part company with Mr. Grünen, who is evidently something more than a mere workman in his art.

Rondino Grazioso. Toccata. Composed by Walter Macfarren. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

MR. MACFARREN'S pianoforte music is always graceful, and touched with the hand of a master, not only of his instrument, but of his art. The "Rondino" before us—reminding us somewhat, in the principal subject, of Mendelssohn's "Streamlet"—is charmingly written throughout, and will be found as agreeable to listen to as useful to practise. The "Toccata" is an excellent study for touch; and as it is just possible that it may partially suffer from its title—which to many amateurs means a dry mechanical exercise—we may say that it can be safely ventured as a "drawing-room piece." We would gladly welcome many more "Toccatas" if their composers would only think that they should be something else than mere finger-work.

Belinda. Gavotte. By Cotsford Dick.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

MR. COTSFORD DICK has evidently a special talent for reproducing the form and spirit of the old dance-tunes, for he not only throws his harmonies into the idiom of the age which called them forth, but his subjects are always pleasing and graceful. The one before us is, we are inclined to think, the best that we have yet seen by this composer. The opening theme—in the second page most happily repeated in several keys—is extremely tuneful; and the second subject, in the sub-dominant, is not only excellent as a contrast, but in itself most attractive. We hope that this composer's latest contribution to our rapidly increasing stock of such pieces will be welcomed as it deserves.

WITH reference to our review of M. Pougin's supplement to Fétis's biographical work, we have received a letter from Mr. G. Oakey, complaining that, in pointing out certain defects, we should have mentioned his name. He considers that we invidiously selected the case of himself and another gentleman as an example of biographical notices inserted at the expense of others which are left out. Mr. Oakey is quite wrong. We have no objection to the appearance of any musician's "life," and it would seem that Mr. Oakey especially deserves such an honour, inasmuch as he declares his name to be known by "many thousands of musical English readers." We are glad, for his sake, to learn that this is so; at the same time Mr. Oakey is not yet as famous as Mr. Manns, and we were within our right when, in criticising the book, not Mr. Oakey, we drew attention to the fact that the existence and work of the more prominent person had been ignored.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE production of a ballet fantastique entitled "La Korrigane," the music written by M. Widor, has been the only novelty at the Paris Grand-Opéra during the past month, the composer having scored a decided success with this his first effort in stage-music. Rossini's "Le Comte Ory," Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," Verdi's "Aida," and Gounod's "Faust" have been the operatic works alternating at the national institution referred to. M. Halanzier, the ex-director, has organised a special performance at the Opéra, which was announced to take place at the end of last month, in aid of the funds of the Association des Artistes Dramatiques, of which he is now the President. All the leading vocalists in the French capital were to take part in the performance, which included the third act of "Aida," "L'Étincelle," the first act of "La Korrigane," and other selections.

M. Leo Délibes, the composer of "Le Roi l'a dit" and "Jean de Nivelle," has been elected Professor of Musical Composition at the Paris Conservatoire in the room of the late Henri Reber.

The Dresden Conservatorium will celebrate this month the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation by a festive performance of the pupils of the institution, which will include J. S. Bach's Mass in A minor.

Rubinstein's opera "Nero," recently performed for the first time at the Berlin Opera, met with a very cool reception, and is not expected to remain long on the répertoire of the royal establishment—at least such is the opinion expressed by the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung. An interesting critical review of the work, from the pen of Herr Max Goldstein, appears in No. 8 of the Musik-Welt.

A new Russian pianiste, Madame Varette Stepanoff, is just now engaged upon a Continental concert-tour, creating much enthusiasm by her eminent technical qualities and the "manly energy" of her playing.

The reputation enjoyed by the Germans for thoroughness has been once more vindicated by the Magdeburg Stadt-Theater, where the recent first performance on that stage of Wagner's "Meistersinger" had been preceded by no less than seventy-five rehearsals of the solo parts, seventeen orchestral, eighty choral, and four general rehearsals. The painstaking conductor of the institution in question is Herr K. Frank, and the effect produced by the performance is described as unique.

We have received the first volume of a biography of Franz Liszt, written under the auspices of the pianist-composer himself by L. Ramann, and comprising the period from 1811 to 1840. The interesting work, which will be completed by an additional volume, is being published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel of Leipzig. We must reserve a more detailed notice for our next number.

Richard Wagner is, we understand, preparing for publication a pamphlet on Johannes Brahms.

Herr Wilhelmj, the eminent violinist, is still in the United States, where he is just now engaged upon a concert-tour, in company with the pianist, Herr Constantin Sternberg.

At the initiative of Herr Joachim, a concert in memory of Carl Eckert was given on the 7th ult. at the Berlin Singakademie, the programme consisting entirely of selections from the works of the deceased composer. Madame Joachim, Mdle. Marianne Brandt, Herren Rudorff, Mannstaedt, and Haussmann, with the orchestra of the Opera, under the direction of Herr Radeck, took part in the performance.

M. Twadar Nachez, a young Hungarian violinist, a pupil of Herr Joachim, has won the golden opinions of German connoisseurs during his recent concert-tour in that country.

The number of operettas written by Offenbach is said to be no less than 102, commencing with "Pascal et Chambord," and concluding with "Les Contes d'Hoffman."

Charles Lecocq has completed a new comic operetta to a libretto by MM. Meilhac and Halévy. It is entitled "Janot," and is shortly to be brought out at the Paris Théâtre de la Renaissance.

Johann Strauss's new operetta, "Das Spitzentuch der Königin," has found much favour with the audience of the Friedrich-Wilhelm Stadt-Theater at Berlin, where it was first performed on November 27.

At the Imperial Theatre of Vienna M. L. Délibes' opera "Jean de Nivelle" is in course of preparation, and will shortly be performed under the direction of the composer.

The opera entitled "Die Geisterbraut," composed by the Duke Eugen of Württemberg, has been splendidly mounted at the Stuttgart Hof-Theater, and was announced to be performed last month. The libretto is founded upon Bürger's ballad of "Lenore."

At the Hamburg Stadt-Theater a successful revival has recently taken place of Auber's little-known opera "Sermont."

A new operetta, entitled "Die Carbonari," composed by Carl Zeller, has been well received at Vienna.

The prize of a thousand florins offered for the composition of an opera to be performed at the inauguration of the new national theatre at Prague has been awarded to the composer Smetana for a work entitled "Libressa."

The inauguration of a newly constructed theatre, the Teatro Costanzi, at Rome, took place on the 28th of November, in the presence of a brilliant assembly headed by the King and Queen of Italy. Honours were heaped upon Signor Costanzi, the founder, and Signor Spondrini, the architect of the building, which is said to be of handsome design, tastefully decorated, possessing, moreover, excellent acoustical properties. The opera chosen for the opening performance was Rossini's "Semiramide."

A new comic opera, "El Amor enamorado," by Arietta, a talented native composer, has been produced with great success at the Royal Opera of Madrid.

Boito's "Mefistotele," performed at Boston in English and at New York in Italian, has been enthusiastically received in both towns.

Carl Emil Seifert, an active musician and able writer on the art, died at Buffalo (U.S.) where he had resided for some years, from the effects of a wound inflicted upon him by the father of one of his pupils. He was born at Berlin in 1849.

Napoléon Henri Reber, a composer of merit, and professor at the Paris Conservatoire, died at the French capital at the age of seventy-three. He had been a pupil of Lesueur, and had written some comic operas, among which "La Nuit de Noël," "Le Père Gaillard," and "Les Papillotes de M. Benoit" were the most successful.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Conservatoire (December 5): Symphony, "Eroica" (Beethoven); Fragments from "Elijah" (Mendelssohn); Largo and Minuet from Twenty-fourth Symphony (Haydn); Fragments from "Orphée" (Gluck); Overture (Berlioz). Concert Populaire (December 5): Symphony, "Harold en Italie" (Berlioz); Symphony, E flat (Mozart); Sérénade Mélancolique (Tchaikowsky); Prélude (Massenet); Scena and Air "Freischütz" (Weber); Airs de Ballet, "La Reine de Saba" (Gounod). Concert Populaire (December 12): Reformation Symphony (Mendelssohn); Fragments from "Prometheus" (Beethoven); Pianoforte Concerto, No. 3 (Saint-Saëns); Danse Persane (Guiraud); Vocal Soli (Rubinstein, Schumann, Schubert, Verdi). Châtelet Concert (December 12): Symphony (Lacombe); Scènes Pittoresques (Massenet); Concerto, G minor (Mendelssohn); Marche Funèbre (Bizet); Fragments from Septet (Beethoven). Conservatoire (December 19): Symphony, No. 2 (Brahms); Choruses from

* Contributions intended for this column should indicate clearly the place and date of performance, as otherwise they cannot be inserted.

"Oberon" (Weber); Overture, "Fingal" (Mendelssohn); Double Chorus (Meyerbeer); Symphony, C major (Beethoven). Concert Populaire (December 19): Symphony, in F (Beethoven); Suite for Violin (Jenő Hubay); Dance from "Le Tasse" (Godard); Fragments from Third Act of the "Walküre" (Wagner); Fantasia in C, for Pianoforte (Schubert-Liszt); Finale from Twenty-ninth Symphony (Haydn). Châtelet Concert (December 19): Overture, "King Lear" (Berlioz); Symphony, G minor (Mozart); Suite Algérienne (Saint-Saëns); Violin Concerto (Beethoven); Overture, "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn).

Leipzig.—Gewandhaus Concert (November 25): Symphony, No. 13 (Haydn); "Das Waldweib," cyclus of songs (Riccius); Violoncello Concerto (Davidoff); Symphony, B flat major (Schumann). Euterpe Concert (November 30): "Paradies und Peri" (Schumann). Gewandhaus Concert (December 2): In memory of Mozart's death (December 5, 1791)—"Requiem;" Overture, "Zauberflöte;" "Ave verum;" Symphony, "Jupiter."

Cologne.—Concert Gesellschaft (December 7): Overture, "Edda" (Carl Reinthaler); Concert-Air (Mendelssohn); Pianoforte Concerto, No. 2 (Weber); Double Chorus from "Colinette à la Cour" (Grétry); Symphony, "Ländliche Hochzeit" (Goldmark); Pianoforte Solos (Mendelssohn, Chopin); Songs (Breuning, Schumann, Brahms); Overture, "Euryanthe" (Weber).

Hartmann); Pianoforte Solos (Mendelssohn, Chopin, &c.).

Florence.—First Mattinata Musicale (of Signori Buonamici, Chiostri and Solci) (December 9); String Quartet, G minor (Haydn); Suite for Pianoforte and Violoncello (Saint-Saëns); Pianoforte Quintet, No. 2 (Sgambati). Second Mattinata Musicale: String Quartet, D major (Mozart); Rondo Brillante for Violin and Pianoforte (Schubert); Pianoforte Trio, D major (Beethoven). Concert of the Società Orchestrale (December 6): Overture, "Anacreon" (Cherubini); Prelude, Choral and Fugue (Bach); Orchestral Suite (Saint-Saëns); Adagio from Quartet, Op. 77 (Raff); Scherzo from Posthumous Quartet (Mendelssohn); Introduction to "Tristan und Isolde" (Wagner); Symphony, C minor (Foroni). Concert of the Società Musicale (December 20): Scotch Symphony (Mendelssohn); Adagio from Quartet, Op. 17 (Rubinstein); Finale from Quartet, Op. 12 (Mendelssohn); Andante from Symphony, Op. 167 (Raff); Dance of Sylphs (Berlioz); March from Sinfonia Cantata (Bazzini).

Baltimore.—Concerts of the Peabody Institute (November 20, 27, December 4): String Quartet, Op. 1 (Svendsen); Spring Song from "Die Walküre" (Wagner); Suite for Violin and Pianoforte (T. P. E. Hartmann); Serenade, Op. 8 (Beethoven); Pianoforte Quartet (Schumann); "O Salutaris" (Palestrina); Sonata for two violins and violoncello (Corelli); Serenade, Op. 3, and Pianoforte Trio, No. 18 (Haydn).

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE POWER OF SOUND."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—You will perhaps grant me space for some words of reply to the review of "The Power of Sound" in your December number, the writer of which, in spite of his general friendliness of tone, considerably misrepresented me; unintentionally, of course, and very likely owing to defects in my own exposition. However that may be, his particular selection of topics suggested, and his general descriptions, I think, proved, that he had not recognised what the design and the main positions of my work are; and these seem to be just the things which the author of a long book, not likely to be very consecutively read, may be usefully allowed to indicate.

Your critic refers me to "the newer school of physiological aestheticians." He represents as my "leading theme" a purely physiological problem, the gradual formation through past ages of our organs of special sense. One special point in connection with the physiological basis of sensation, which I purposely relegated to a note and an appendix, forms, according to him, "a prominent feature of my survey of the whole subject." And my book is described as "an outcome of the Helmholtzian doctrines," helped out by Darwinism: a view which cannot but receive some apparent support from the selection for special notice of some obscure points, presenting little interest except to professed students of physiological psychology.

As a matter of fact I hold, of course, that our various capacities for enjoyment have their seat in the organism; but that the connection can be shown and formulated only in the very simplest cases. The insistence on distinct and individual form as of the essence of music no less than of sculpture, which is the first cardinal point in my book, I have removed by every effort in my power from any contact with "physiological aesthetics." I have pointed out again and again that the physiological considerations which will in a sense explain the conditions of satisfaction in colour or tone are totally irrelevant to our perception of particular forms or melodies as beautiful. As regards the latter, my efforts are rather directed to explaining why they cannot be explained, as any reader of my seventh, eighth, and ninth chapters will see.

Next, as to Darwinism, I recognise, indeed, the importance of Mr. Darwin's suggestion of sexual association, in spite of the enormous difficulties which it entails (p. 121 et seq.), since, as I say, it seems the only suggestion yet made which goes far enough and deep enough to offer a chance of accounting for the might and mystery of melodic effect. But I conceive that here again I have made clear its total inadequacy, or rather its irrelevance, in respect of the most conspicuous problems of music, e.g., the startling difference in emotional power between this and that succession of notes. This leads on to the lengthy discussion of what melodic forms or motions really are, of their wholly unique and unparalleled nature, and of the consequent uniqueness of the faculty by which the proportions they present are appreciated. The existence of developed melodic forms in two dimensions, the fusion or interpenetration of the two factors, those of time and pitch, each accurately measured, and the particular set of measurements of each, in each particular form, being as indispensable to one another as the two blades of a pair of scissors—all this, unnoticed by your critic, is in my view the second cardinal point of my book. From it are deduced a variety of conclusions; e.g., the impossibility of explaining or demonstrating the superiority or inferiority of this form to that; the hopelessness of any analogue of visual lines; the error of trying to explain the essence of musical effects by reference to physical motion, or of looking forward to a "music of visible motion"; the radical distinction of melody from speech; the fatuity of the view (the commonness of which I show by quotations) that the rhythmic factor is an adjunct, or even a bond whose "tyranny" the ideal music will throw off, as though an ideal and superior sort of scissors would be produced by one blade throwing off the tyranny of the other; the necessarily inorganic and unarresting nature of strains which present no assured basis of accents; and many more.

With these two cardinal points is closely connected the third, also unnoticed by your critic; the distinction between the impressive and expressive aspects of music, the essentially unique and (to a great extent) isolated nature of the characteristic musical emotions, and the absurdities which follow the attempt to make out music to be simply "a language of expression," as though its business were to express things (whether feelings, or ideas, or objects, or events) otherwise knowable. From this point, again, flow numerous subordinate corollaries and observations, which I must not take up space by enumerating.

I think, however, that even this brief indication of the main pivots of my inquiry will show how slight must be its contact with acoustical science. Of Helmholtz's work in the domain of sound I am an ardent and humble admirer: but surely that need not prevent my asserting what my subject makes it imperative to assert, and what Helmholtz has himself admitted, that the material of music is not music; that scales and overtones are not melody any more than bricks and mortar are architecture. The only facts out of this region of material which are necessary for my purposes are the existence of such things as tones and scales and consonances and dissonances: a knowledge of their physical laws, and of their modes of formation and varieties, so brilliantly and exhaustively explained by Helmholtz, is as unnecessary for my readers as it is irrelevant to the main substance of my work; or as proficiency in comparative philology is unnecessary to the appreciation and discussion of poetry. The formed aesthetic products with which by far the larger part of my book is concerned cannot, as I have already said, be ultimately explained in the same sense as Helmholtz explains his discoveries; but they present an infinity of noticeable facts, and suggest many interesting topics; and one of the first of these is the falsity of the very common view that physical facts do explain music, that melodies are a sort of order which is reducible to mathematical law. Your critic seems to hold the true view on this subject, and in the main also to credit me with it; but in fathering my inquiry on that of Helmholtz, he must surely see that he suggests the very confusion between the free forms and indescribable emotions which it took a Beethoven to originate, and the acoustical facts of which Beethoven knew nothing. Whether successfully carried out or not, my object has been to apply scientific observation and accurate treatment to phenomena which are as remote from physics as from metaphysics.

Again, your critic says that I "have not made any effort to separate quality of tone from harmony, or to show where and when they differ in degree, admitting that they are the same in kind." I can but reply that to me they seem utterly different in kind (see notes on pp. 244 and 247), and that I have written two long chapters, one on colour or quality of tone, one on harmony, where the distinction is explained with, I fear, tedious emphasis: such being the importance I attach to the topic of sound-colour and of its clear separation from form (melodic and harmonic), that I would put that forward as the fourth cardinal point of my book. (Your critic's special questions are answered in ch. xi., § 7, and ch. vii., § 11, and on pp. 288 and 289.)

One word more, and I have done. My "antiquated predilection" for Mendelssohn's music (which I believe I only mention once, and then without a single expression of personal opinion) and the "thinness" of my Schumannism (which goes as deep, at any rate, as my musical nature) may be left to take care of themselves. What I rather complain of is the general impression which would, I think, be conveyed by this part of the review, that I had been occupied in airing and pressing anything so supremely unimportant as my own fads and partialities. Whereas I specially point out that my arguments might be throughout followed with assent by those whose personal estimate of particular compositions differed utterly from mine; and I have not only abundantly expressed, but also (I venture to think) demonstrated, my fundamental belief, that in music very wide tolerance is not so much charitable as scientific; it being a matter of simple observation that, under similar conditions of love and knowledge of the art, persons may present remarkable differences as to the specimens which they respectively find exceptionally impressive; differences which are necessarily as unanalysable as the impressions. My view on this subject, and my reasons for it, cannot be misunderstood by any one who will read my last chapter, on "musical criticism."

I am, Sir, yours obediently,
EDMUND GURNEY.

THE STAFF v. TONIC SOL-FA NOTATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Mr. Stratton, in his reply to me, admits what I have been contending for—viz., that the average chorus-singer, in reading from the Tonic Sol-fa Notation, can have no doubt as to the key he is singing in, and consequently has a superiority over the singer from the Staff Notation, in that important respect at least. He also admits that "this advantage is still further increased when the singer from the Staff Notation has only his single 'part' before him."

Now, for the key to be more perceptible, in the example I gave, in the Staff than in the Sol-fa Notation, I cannot see at all. In the Staff Notation there is a "formidable array" of sharps, commencing with the third measure, meant to denote key B; in the Sol-fa it is simply and clearly stated key B. What could be more lucid?

He goes on to say: "To render the example more just, either the chromatic signs should be used in the latter, or the key-signature inserted in the former, where the change occurs." Will Mr. Stratton kindly take up a work in both notations, look at a passage where a change of key occurs, and answer me if, in the Staff Notation the key-signature is inserted, or in the Sol-fa the chromatic signs are employed? Methinks, were the chromatic signs used in the Sol-fa Notation to divide every transition and modulation—gradual, sudden, passing, and extended—it would be transition—into chaos. I simply translated the example as extended change of key is always translated into the Sol-fa Notation.

But I ask, in the name of justice, how can the want of memory (or stupidity) on the part of a singer, be called a fault of the notation he is using? Mr. Stratton gravely states that "a singer might easily forget what key he was singing in." That is surely his own fault, and not through any want of clearness on the point as represented by the notation.

I do not think Mr. Stratton has proved that, "in extreme modulations (or transitions) the Tonic Sol-fa Notation becomes more difficult and complicated" than the Staff.

With regard to "A London Organist," I think my reply to Mr. Stratton answers him as well as I can, except when he says in speaking of the examples given by me, "there is no legitimate modulation." Of course, there is no gradual modulation, leading to the new key; but Mr. Stratton and I were speaking of sudden and extreme modulations—not gradual.

I am surely not tied, in going to the key of B from C, to modulate into G, then into D, into A, into E, and finally into B, in each transition writing several measures to fill the ear with a new key? I think not. "A London Organist" can find abundance of examples in classical works, without my quoting any, where the modulation is sudden and extreme; it may be for special effect.

Yours truly,
THOMAS MANSON.

BACH'S PEDAL PASSAGES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Allow me to correct a prevalent mistake in regard to the limit of range of the pedal part in Bach's organ works, which I see is repeated in Mr. Hipkins's article on "Pedals" in Part XII. of Grove's "Dictionary of Music," viz., that Bach only once wrote up to for the pedals, in the second pedal solo of the Toccata in F.

In the Prelude on the chorale "Gottes sohn ist kommen" (No. 2, in Mendelssohn's edition of the compositions on chorales) the pedal part is written up to F, and in No. 12 of the Preludes in the same edition, a curious double canon on the old hymn "In dulci jubilo," the pedal part is written up to

In both these cases the pedal plays the tenor, and not the bass of the composition, taking the Canto fermo; in the first-mentioned case the pedal part is marked "Pedal Trompette 8 Fuss," a direction taken, no doubt, from the original MSS. of this set of Preludes, which were in Mendelssohn's possession; so there is no doubt of the notes being intended to be played as they were written. These examples seem to show either that there were then to be found pedal-boards extending to F and G, or that Bach thought there ought to be.

I have so often heard the statement about Bach's one high pedal F, from people who might have been expected to know all that could be known about Bach's organ music, that it seems worth while to make a note of it.

Yours, &c.,
H. H. STATHAM.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

F. A.—As Counterpoint is the application of the principles of Harmony, we should recommend our correspondent to study Harmony first.

A POOR STUDENT.—Scholarships are open to those having exceptional talent; but we fear that a "love of music" and a "desire to become a musician," are not sufficient qualifications to secure a gratuitous education in the art.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BELFAST.—At the first Concert of the season given by Mr. Kempton in the Strandtown Schoolhouse on the 13th ult., the newly formed Belfast Select Choir made its début most successfully. A selection of part-songs was exceedingly well sung by the choir, and elicited the heartiest applause. The vocalists were Miss Lily Browne, Mrs. Kempton, Mr. O'Shea, Mr. J. Ritchie, and Mr. Kempton, all of whom were highly appreciated. The Concert was a great success, and highly creditable to Mr. W. J. Kempton (Conductor) and the members of the Society.

BIRKENHEAD.—The Concert of the Musical Society took place on Tuesday, November 30, in the Public Hall, and was in every respect a marked success. Mendelssohn's Oratorio, St. Paul, was the work performed. The principal vocalists were Madame Billie Porter, Mr. E. Dalzell, and Mr. Hilton, the contralto solos being taken by Miss James, a member of the choir. Dr. Hiles conducted, and Mr. Pattison presided at the organ. The band and chorus, numbering 120 performers, gave evidence of advance in their work.

BIRMINGHAM.—Mr. S. S. Stratton's third Chamber Concert was given in the Masonic Hall, on Tuesday, the 7th ult. The programme included Mozart's Quintet in A, for clarinet and strings; Impromptu in B flat, Op. 142, No. 3, Schubert; Duo for violin and viola, Op. 13, Spohr; Notturmo in F minor, Op. 21, clarinet, H. Bärmann; Quartet in F, strings, Alfred Mellon; and Trio in G minor, Op. 1, piano and strings, Goetz. The last three pieces were performed for the first time in Birmingham; and much interest was excited by the production of Mellon's quartet, the composer having been a townsman. The pianist was Mrs. Hale, and the clarinet parts were ably given by Mr. T. E. Pountney. —Mr. Richard Rickard gave a Pianoforte Recital on Thursday, the 9th ult. Schumann's grand Fantasia in C, Op. 17, was magnificently played; and Rubinstein's Sonata, Op. 18, for pianoforte and violoncello, in which Mr. Rickard was joined by Herr van Biene, was also a feature in the programme. There was a large attendance, and the young artist was frequently recalled and much applauded. —The same evening, Mr. Joseph Short gave a Concert in the Town Hall, when his new Mass, St. Joseph, was produced; also a march, "Cardinale," composed for the occasion, and dedicated (like the Mass) to his Eminence, Cardinal Newman. A miscellaneous selection followed. The principal artists were, Miss José Sherrington, Miss Leipold, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lander. The Organist was Mr. Bond, Mr. Waters accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. Short conducted. —The Midland Musical Society gave its first Concert at the Church of the Saviour, on Tuesday, the 14th ult., when Haydn's Creation was performed. The principal artists were Miss Fraser Brunner, Mr. S. Roper, Mr. W. Glydon, and Mr. W. Lusted. The band and chorus numbered 120. Mr. S. S. Stratton was the Organist, and Mr. W. H. Stevenson conducted. —The Amateur Harmonic Association gave an open Rehearsal at the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 16th ult. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's Second Psalm, Handel's Dettingen Te Deum, and Bennett's May Queen. There was a capital band, and the performance was very successful. The whole of the solos, &c., were sustained by members of the Association. Mr. Stockley conducted. —The cheap Concerts of the Musical Association continue their successful course, the most noteworthy of recent Concerts being that of Saturday, the 11th ult., when the Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Duchemin, gave its assistance. Miss Florence Major and Mr. Sinclair Dunn were the vocalists, and Mr. F. Crowe solo-pianist.

BRADFORD.—Mr. Edward Misdale's second Concert of the season was given in the Mechanics' Institute, on the 13th ult., when there was a good attendance. The programme was an interesting one, comprising two or three selections of importance, for pianoforte and orchestra, as well as some vocal pieces, which were entrusted to Miss Misdale. Mr. Misdale opened the Concert by a performance of two studies, by Henselt and Rubinstein respectively, in which his ability as an executant was strikingly displayed. Miss Misdale sang Randegger's "Sleep, dearest, sleep," in a manner that won for her the warm approval of the audience. This was followed by a performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor for pianoforte and orchestra, by Mr. Misdale and the members of the Bradford Amateur Orchestral Society, Mr. Tate acting as Conductor. Sterndale Bennett's Trio in A, Op. 26, for piano, violin, and violoncello, was excellently played by Mr. Misdale, Mr. Rees, and Mr. W. B. Cross; and a Gavotte and Musette for pianoforte and orchestra, by Raff, concluded the Concert.

BRISTOL.—On Monday, November 29, Mr. Riseley gave his sixth Monday Popular Concert in the Colston Hall, when the band performed Haydn's Symphony in D, Op. 11 ("The Clock"); Bennett's Overture, The Naiades; Reissiger's Overture, Die Felsenmühle; Mendelssohn's Cornelius March; Gounod's Entr'acte, La Colombe, and "Funeral March of a Marionette"; and a Serenade for stringed orchestra (Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Trio, and Finale), by Mozart, which was given for the second time in this country. Miss Arthur and Miss Alice Denzil were the vocalists, Mr. A. W. Waite led the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted. —On Wednesday, the 1st ult., the Bristol Handel Society gave a performance of the Creation, in the Lesser Colston Hall, when the principal vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Mr. J. Gawthrop, and Mr. Henry Pope. The band and chorus consisted of about 100 performers, of which Mr. A. Whitaker was Conductor. —On Thursday, the 2nd ult., the first of a series of special Advent Services was given in the Cathedral, when a large voluntary choir of about 200 voices assisted the ordinary Cathedral choir with very fine effect. The service used Wesley's, in F, and the anthem, Spohr's, "God, Thou art great." Mr. George Riseley, the Organist of the Cathedral, presided at the organ, and the Rev. Precentor Hey, conducted the anthem. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Powell, of Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire. —On Monday, the 6th ult., Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.R.S.L., gave a very interesting Lecture at the Bristol Museum and Library, on "Carols for Christmas and other festive seasons." He glanced at the ancient history of the carol, and then proceeded to call attention to spiritual or devotional carols, narrative carols, and to the revival of the practice and study of carol singing. He also spoke of jovial carols, and lastly noticed "In dulci jubilo," of German origin, first introduced into this country by R. L. de Pearsall, who prepared it for the Bristol Madrigal Society, which carol Mr. Barrett spoke of as the most beautiful in existence. The lecturer was assisted by the members of the choir of St. Mary's, Tyndall's Park, who sang examples of the various classes of carols. —On the 8th ult., the Bristol Musical Festival Society gave a Concert in the Colston Hall, when Beethoven's grand Mass in D, and Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion were given, and the Adeste Fideles, as arranged by V. Novello, for quartet and chorus. The solos in all the works were rendered by several members of the Festival Choir. The choruses were all well sung by the Festival Choir, and Mr. George Riseley played the accompaniments on the grand organ throughout with marked skill. Mr. D. W. Rootham, the Society's choromaster, conducted. —On Thursday, the 9th ult., the second special Advent Service was held in the Cathedral, when Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, "O come, let us worship," was given as the anthem by the Cathedral choir and the volunteers, the service being again Wesley, in F. Mr. George Riseley, the Cathedral Organist, occupied his usual place, and the Rev. Precentor Hey conducted. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Millar, vicar of Cirencester. —On Friday, the 10th ult., two Concerts were given in the Colston Hall, by the band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry (Portsmouth Division), when a selection of music, for the most part of a popular kind, was given by the band, conducted by Mr. Krejer. An agreeable feature in the performance was the singing of some glees by the members of the band, proving them to be good singers as well as players. Miss Kate Probert was the vocalist, and Mr. A. E. Hill presided at the pianoforte. —On Monday, the 13th ult., the last Popular Concert for the present year was given in the Colston Hall, when a very fine programme was excellently performed. The principal items of the programme were Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, the Overtures Anacreon (Cherubini) and Tannhäuser (Wagner), the Introduction to the first and third acts of Wagner's Lohengrin, and Berlioz's Danse des Sylphes. Miss Hilda Wilson and Miss Berrie Stephens were the vocalists, Mr. A. W. Waite led the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted. —On the same evening Mr. Sims Reeves made a visit to Bristol in his farewell tour, and appeared at the New Theatre in Guy Rannering, in which he sang "Tom Bowling," "Good bye, sweetheart," "The pilgrim of love," and the "Echo Duet" with Madame Alice Barth. The theatre was crowded, and Mr. Reeves, who was in splendid voice, was enthusiastically applauded. —On Wednesday, the 15th ult., Mr. Sims Reeves again appeared at the New Theatre in the Beggar's Opera and a Ballad Concert, when his son (Mr. Herbert Reeves) appeared for the first time in Bristol. The other vocalists were Madame Alice Barth, Miss Lucy Franklin, and Mr. George Fox. Mr. J. L. Roedel and Mr. H. Nicholson played Benedict and Bucher's Concertante on Themes by Rossini, for the piano and flute. —On the same evening a Concert was given by Mr. Alfred Brookes in the Lesser Colston Hall, when Beethoven's Engedi, and a selection from H.M.S. Pinafore (Sullivan), were performed by a choir of about sixty voices. The principal vocalists were Miss Kate Spary, Miss Marie Gane, Miss Annie Howell, Mr. E. T. Morgan, Mr. N. O'Donovan, Mr. V. Stroud, and Mr. W. Thomas. Dr. Colman presided at the piano, and Mr. A. E. Hill at the harmonium. Mr. Brookes conducted. —On Thursday, the 16th, the third Special Advent Service was given in the Cathedral. The choir, which consisted of 250 voices, was supported by an efficient band of fifty performers, and the combined forces gave a splendid rendering of the whole of Mendelssohn's St. Paul, as the anthem. The soprano recitatives and solos were finely rendered by two choristers from Windsor, and the other solos were extremely well sung by Messrs. E. T. Morgan, A. Brookes, W. Thomas, T. F. Nash, and W. Merrick, all members of the Bristol Cathedral Choir. The effect in the grand and massive building, crowded by an immense congregation, was beautiful, and supremely solemn and impressive. Mr. George Riseley, the Cathedral Organist, conducted the performance. —On Saturday, the 18th ult., two Concerts were given in the Colston Hall by the band of the Grenadier Guards, assisted by the bands of the Bristol Artillery and Bristol Rifle Corps. Both Concerts were thoroughly well attended, and the performances of an excellent character. Miss Kate Hayes was the vocalist, and Mr. Dan Godfrey conducted.

CHELTEMHAM.—Messrs. Lillywhite and Pollock's special Promenade Concert at the Rotunda, on the 9th ult., gave additional evidence of the increasing popularity of these afternoon "Réunions," for, notwithstanding the extra charge for admission, the audience was as numerous as at any of the previous entertainments. Mr. George Cox sang the songs allotted to him with great taste, especially "Alice, where art thou?" and Miss Dones was highly successful in "There is a green hill far away," for which she received an encore. A pianoforte and harp duet, by Messrs. Linter and Pollock was most artistically rendered, and a violoncello solo by Mr. E. Teague, jun., was also greatly applauded. The band fully sustained its reputation.—The Cheltenham Musical Society gave its first Concert of the season at the Assembly Rooms, on the evening of the 14th ult. The works selected were Mozart's Twelfth Mass, Gade's Christmas Eve, and Abt's Water Fairies. The room was, as is always the case at these Concerts, crowded. The Mass was well sung; the choruses were attacked with firmness and decision, and Mr. A. von Holst at the harmonium, with Mr. Harford Lloyd at the pianoforte, played sufficiently well to partially compensate for the absence of an orchestra. The principal vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna, Mr. Evans, Madame Gomez, and the Rev. C. Baxter. Abt's Water Fairies, was very effectively sung; the principals being Miss Blencowe, Miss Jackson, and Miss Brereton. Christmas Eve is a charming composition, but its performance was marred by want of an orchestra, so needful for a proper rendering of any of the works of Gade. The solo parts were sung with great taste by Miss Percival, of the Ladies' College. The Concert was a success, on which Mr. Dyer, the Society's talented Conductor, may be fairly congratulated.

CLIFTON.—On Monday, the 6th ult., Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy gave her second Classical Chamber Concert in the Victoria Rooms, the performers being Mr. Henry Holmes (1st violin), Mr. Michael Rice (2nd violin), Mr. A. Burnett (viola), Mr. J. Pomeroy (violinello), and Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy (pianoforte). Beethoven's string Quartet, No. 50 (Op. 18), in A; Rheinberger's Quartet (Op. 38), in E flat, for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello; and Mozart's string Quartet, No. 4, in E flat were most artistically played.

CREWE.—The members of the Crewe Philharmonic Society opened the season with a miscellaneous Concert in the Town Hall on Tuesday evening, November 30, before a large and enthusiastic audience. The principal artists were Miss Rachel Green and Mr. J. Barrow (vocalists), Mr. H. Sedgwick (solo violin), and Mr. J. Walton (solo violoncello). The first item in the programme was the Overture to Fra Diavolo, given with much effect by the orchestra. The part-music was sung with great precision, and gave unmistakable evidence of the careful training the members had undergone. Mr. J. Barrow made his début before a Crewe audience, and gave "I fear no foe" and "The Roll-Call" (Pinsuti), the latter receiving a hearty encore. Miss Green sang with much feeling and expression. The violin and violoncello soli, together with an instrumental quartet, Haydn's "Hymn to the Emperor," in which Messrs. H. Taylor and J. H. Longson took part, were features of the evening. Mr. F. James conducted, and Mr. G. Young accompanied.

CROYDON.—On Tuesday, the 7th ult., an evening Concert was given in the Large Public Hall, under the direction of Mr. Eimer R. Showler. The programme was well chosen, and the various items excellently rendered. The vocalists were, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Beatrice Wade, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. W. H. Burgon, and Mr. A. Wilmut; the instrumentalists, Mdlle. Mathilde Wurm (pianoforte), M. Victor Buziau (violin), and Mr. Reed (violinello). The programme opened with Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, Op. 46, for piano, violin, and violoncello, which was played to perfection. Mr. Maas was most enthusiastically received. One of the chief features of the Concert was the rendering, by M. Buziau, of Vieuxtemps' Ballade et Polonaise. Mr. Reed played Raff's Cavatina in a very pleasing manner; and Mdlle. Wurm's brilliant performance of the two solos allotted to her—Chopin's Polonaise in E flat, and "La Truite" (Heller)—was much applauded. The vocalists were all highly appreciated. Mr. H. S. Webster was a most efficient accompanist.—Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion and Hymn of Praise were performed at the Public Hall, on the 13th ult., by the Croydon Vocal Union. The soloists in the first work were Miss B. Harding, Miss Howard (an amateur member of the choir), Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Mr. W. H. Burgon. The incidental quartets were effectively rendered by the soloists, and the whole performance was excellent. Madame Edith Wynne sang the principal soprano part in the Hymn of Praise, in her well-known manner. The solos were generally well given, Mr. Shakespeare making the greatest success by his artistic singing of "The sorrows of death." The band, which was selected from the Crystal Palace Orchestra, was highly efficient. The choir was well balanced, and the choruses were given with precision and vigour. The whole performance was conducted by Mr. E. Carr.—Mr. George Russell's annual Concert of classical music took place on the 15th ult., the vocalists being Mrs. Osgood and Mr. W. Shakespeare (a native of Croydon), and the instrumentalists Mr. Henry Holmes (violin) and Signor Pezze (violinello).

DUBLIN.—The first Oratorio Service of St. Patrick's Oratorio Society was celebrated in the Cathedral on the 30th November. The service commenced with the Advent collect, the collect for St. Andrew's day, the Lord's prayer, and a portion of the versicles; after which the Messiah (the Oratorio selected for the occasion) was sung almost in its entirety, and finely rendered throughout. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Pate Throver, Mr. Hemley, Mr. Walter Bapty, Mr. R. Smith, Mr. Grattan Kelly, and Master Dalton. Mrs. Throver's singing was particularly bright in the aria, "Rejoice greatly"; her phrasing was careful, and altogether the rendering was meritorious. The other solos were highly satisfactory, especial praise being due to Master Dalton for his delivery of some of the recitatives. The chorus singing would have done credit to a much older Society, thanks to the careful training of Mr. C. G. Marchant, who presided, both with skill and intelligence, at the organ.

DUNDEE.—The seventh annual Festival of the Associated Choirs took place on Thursday evening, November 25, in St. Paul's Church. There were about 150 voices, representing the choirs of St. Paul's, St. Salvador's, St. Mary Magdalene's, Dundee; St. Margaret's, Lochee;

St. Mary's, Broughty Ferry; and St. John the Baptist, Carnoustie. A large number of clergy were present, including the Bishop of Brechin and Dean Nicholson. The service-book for this occasion was edited by Mr. W. J. Christopher, Organist of St. Mary's, Broughty Ferry, and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were specially composed by him for the occasion. The anthem was Sir John Goss's "The wilderness," which was exceedingly well sung throughout. The psalms were sung to Anglican chants, and the hymns to tunes by J. H. Collinson (specially composed), E. J. Hopkins, J. Baptiste Calkin, and Arthur Sullivan. Mr. Christopher conducted with great precision, and Mr. W. H. Richmond played the voluntaries.—The Dundee Select Choir gave a Concert on November 26, at the Kinnaird Hall, before a large and appreciative audience. The precision and unity of feeling with which the choir sang in all the pieces, betokened the Conductor's care in training, and also spoke well for the attention and ability of the members. Among the most noticeable items were Smart's "O hear ye not, maidens?" Booth's "It was a lover and his lass," Leslie's "Lullaby of life," Sir R. P. Stewart's arrangement of "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower," and two Scotch airs, viz., "Wae's me for Prince Charlie," by Mr. Lambeth, and "The wae'fu' heart," the latter expressly arranged for the Dundee Select Choir by Mr. W. N. Watson. Both of these were redemanded. The successful solos were "Angels ever bright and fair," and "O luce di quest' anima," which were ably sung, and encored.—On the 10th ult., Messrs. J. Stringer and Co.'s new organ for St. Stephen's Established Church, Broughty Ferry, was inaugurated by Dr. Spark; the powers of the instrument, despite its unfortunate imprisonment within a recess which surrounds it closely on three sides, and overlaps it by a low arch above, being displayed to the best advantage. A well trained choir of about thirty voices sang several anthems most creditably—notably Dr. Spark's "I shall see Him," and Dr. Elvey's "Praise the Lord." Gounod's "Jesu, Word of God Incarnate" (unaccompanied) was also fairly well sung. Mr. Edward Jobson, Organist and Choirmaster to the church, conducted; and the Rev. Mr. Cooper, minister of the church, presided.

EASINGWOLD.—On Friday, the 10th ult., the Choral Society gave its first Concert of the present season. The programme was miscellaneous, consisting of vocal and instrumental music. The choir sang several choruses very well. Mr. T. Smith played Schubert's Sonata in D major with much skill, and Mr. Groves was loudly applauded for his performance of Gounod's Méditation on the violoncello, accompanied by Miss Hicks. Miss Johnson gained an encore for her rendering of S. Heller's Tarantelle in F minor, and responded with a Gavotte by Bach. An amateur string band made its début at the Concert. The songs by Dr. Witze, Mr. J. C. Bannister, and Miss Mullens were all loudly applauded. Mr. Beasley conducted.

EASTBOURNE.—The annual performance of the Messiah by the Eastbourne Choral Society took place on Thursday evening, the 9th ult., at the Pavilion, Devonshire Park. The band, which was under the leadership of Herr Cramer, numbered some fifteen performers, and the choir was little short of a hundred. Mr. Henry W. Hardy, the leader of the Society, conducted; Mr. J. Taylor, Mus. Bac., Cantab., presided at the harmonium; and Mr. Arthur Hood (Mr. Hardy's pupil) at the piano. The solos were sustained almost exclusively by members of the Society, the only professional vocalist being Mr. Arthur Hooper, of London, who sang all the tenor solos with much effect. The choruses were all so uniformly well rendered that it would be difficult to single out any for special mention. The band was throughout most effective, the Overture and Pastoral Symphony being finely played.

EDINBURGH.—The first of Professor Sir Herbert Oakley's Organ Recitals this winter was given in the Music Class-Room on the 2nd ult. to a crowded audience. The attendance of the students was very large, and the Professor had an enthusiastic welcome. Several numbers in the programme were given for the first time in the Class-Room, and warmly received. During the last few weeks additions have been made to the celebrated instrument in the Class-Room, which render it even more complete than the ideal organ which the late Professor Donaldson had in view when he stated £4,000 as its probable cost. Only half this sum seems to have been granted to him by the order of the Court of Session of 1855, yet during the last fifteen years, without any further grant, the "Reid" organ has been gradually completed. The final additions just made are all to the "pedal" organ. The instrument now has sixty-six stops, eleven of which belong to the pedal organ. In this important department is included a specimen of a metal as well as of a wood register of "thirty-two feet," by which length of pipe a pitch of an octave below the lowest note of most organs is obtained. Another addition to the Class-Room since last session is the filling up of the second of the ten panels intended for figures of the greatest composers from 1665 to 1855—spaces which the present Professor hopes may some day be all occupied. Mozart now faces his great successor, Beethoven, and both figures are painted by a Munich artist.

EGHAM.—A Concert was given at the Institute on the 2nd ult., for the benefit of Mr. T. F. Faulkner, the blind organist of St. Jude's. Messrs. H. Barnby and Packer, with four of the choristers of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and a quartet of the Eton Choir, gave several part-songs and glees. Messrs. O. Christian and Mellor were recalled after Cooke's duet, "Love and war"; and ballads were sung by Master Winterbottom, Messrs. Ogilvy, Smith, and Christian. Mr. Huntley, pupil of Sir George Elvey, was solo pianist and conductor.

FOLKESTONE.—The members of the Amateur Orchestral Society gave an excellent Concert in the Town Hall on the 6th ult. The Conductor, Mr. H. S. Roberts, proved throughout the Concert his thorough efficiency. Mr. J. R. C. Roberts was leader and principal violin. The orchestral works were all capably rendered, but the various movements of Haydn's Surprise Symphony and Auber's Overture to Masaniello were given in such a manner as to deserve the highest commendation. The flute solo of Mr. G. Nicholson was a masterly performance, and a hearty recall was the result. The vocalists were Miss José Sherrington and Mr. Bernard Lane.

FROME.—Handel's Oratorio, the Messiah, was performed at the Wesleyan Chapel on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult., by a choir of one hundred voices, in aid of the fund now being raised for the enlargement and improvement of the organ. The singers comprised the choir of the Wesleyan Chapel, the Frome Temperance Choral Society, and other friends connected with the church and chapel choirs in the town. Mr. W. B. Harvey conducted, and Mr. T. Grant presided at the organ. The soloists were Miss Harvey, Miss Hillman, Miss Bessie Swaine, Mrs. W. H. Penny, Mr. W. B. Harvey, Mr. O. Roberts, Mr. J. Lewis, and Mr. E. R. Trotman.

GLOUCESTER.—The large organ at the Shire Hall has suffered so many years of neglect, and has consequently been so long unfit for use, that probably few persons were aware of the real quality and powers of the instrument. It is still substantially what it was when first erected thirty-one years ago, but has recently undergone repairs at the hands of its original builder, Mr. J. Nicholson, of Worcester, and some alterations have been made to adapt it to more modern requirements. The principal portion of the expenditure has necessarily been confined to the cleaning, revoicing, and details in connection with the mechanism; and Mr. C. H. Lloyd, who kindly undertook the management, must be credited with having judiciously disposed of the limited amount allowed him by the committee. Of course, as a practical organist, he has borne in mind the convenience of the player, and a modern keyboard has been substituted for the old action, which unduly taxed the physical powers of the performer. The showy-looking, but large and "unhandy" drawstops, have been replaced by smaller ones more conveniently placed, and new pedals have been supplied. The other alterations are mainly in the sixteen-foot stops; pipes of a smaller scale have taken the place of the very large open diapasons. The unsatisfactory gamba in the great organ has gone to make way for a clarabella. The "reopening" of the organ (which took place on November 26) could not have been in better hands than those of Mr. W. Parratt, Mus. Bac. of Magdalen College, Oxford, whose high reputation as an organist created an interest bordering on curiosity, and whose performance thoroughly justified expectation. His selection of pieces was excellent, and well calculated to exhibit the powers of the instrument in all their variety, as well as his own skill as a performer. The vocal portion of the programme had necessarily a subordinate place. In order to insure a successful result the Choral Society combined with the organ committee, and offered the entire profits of this Concert to the organ fund, and the display of the organ being the principal object, the idea of giving an oratorio was postponed till another occasion. The choruses and part-songs were selected for relief and contrast to the organ solos, and do not call for any particular mention beyond a word of approval for the care in rendering and the prompt attention given to the Conductor. The only solo vocalist was Miss Beata Francis, who has a soprano voice of moderate compass and considerable power, and is a very careful singer. Mr. G. R. Sinclair acted as accompanist throughout, and deserves praise for the effective manner in which he fulfilled his important post. Mr. C. H. Lloyd officiated as Conductor.

GRAVESEND.—On the 9th ult., the annual Concert was given at the Assembly Rooms, in aid of the funds of the Customs' Orphanage. There was a crowded audience, and Mr. Phillips, who again took the direction, had provided a good programme. He was assisted by Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Marian Burton, Madame Rose Stuart, Miss Annie Cole (a very promising but over young débutante), Madame Vivian, Mr. Arthur Thomas, Mr. W. G. Forington, and Mr. H. P. Matthews, the buff singer, all of whose efforts were well received. Miss Clara Matthews was the solo pianist, and Mr. W. Miller the accompanist.

GREAT YARMOUTH.—Mendelssohn's Oratorio, St. Paul, was selected for performance at the first Concert this season of the Musical Society, which took place in the Drill Hall on Thursday evening, the 2nd ult. The rendering of the Oratorio was in every sense creditable, and justified the selection of such an ambitious work. The principal vocalists were Madame Lemens-Sherrington, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. Bridson. The members of the choir acquitted themselves most honourably in the difficult music assigned to them. So conspicuously good a performance on their part spoke volumes as to the valuable training they had received from their excellent Conductor, Mr. Henry Stonex, and to the attention they must have given to his instructions. The band, which was under the leadership of Mr. Cooke, of Ipswich, proved itself very efficient. Mr. Burwood officiated at the harmonium.

HALIFAX.—At a meeting of the subscribers to the Halifax Philharmonic Society it was resolved, after due consideration, to dissolve the Society, the majority of those present, however, deeply regretting that such a course of proceeding should be imperatively called for. In the local paper which records this event a letter appears from Mr. H. W. Pohlmann, suggesting that a Society should be formed, with a guarantee fund sufficient to defray the expenses of the public Concerts; and as many others seem much interested in the subject, it is to be hoped that something may speedily be done to sustain the musical reputation of so important a town.

KENDAL.—On Tuesday, the 14th ult., Dr. Crotch's Oratorio, Palestine, was performed in St. George's Hall by the Choral Society. The solo vocalists were Miss Annie Sinclair, Miss Parratt, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Burgin. The chorus, numbering upwards of 100 voices, sang remarkably well during the whole evening, and the band, consisting of some twenty-five performers, with Mr. Collison of Liverpool, as principal violin, was all that could be desired. The Society has been drilled and conducted for the past ten years by Mr. W. B. Armstrong and Mr. W. Smallwood.

KIDDERMINSTER.—The Kidderminster Choral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult. The orchestra was considerably strengthened, the leading parts being taken by Messrs. C. Hayward and W. Elgar. Mr. Wadely presided at the organ, and Mr. Wedley at the pianoforte. The performance of the Symphony was highly satisfactory, and throughout reflected great credit upon the band. The choruses were very efficiently rendered. Miss Julia Jones, Miss E. Parry, and Mr. S. Ford were the solo vocalists. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous. Mr. Fitzgerald conducted.

KING'S HEATH, NEAR BIRMINGHAM.—At the Institute on Monday, the 6th ult., Mr. S. S. Stratton lectured to the members, his subject being "Royal and Aristocratic Musicians." After dwelling briefly upon the ancient examples of royal and distinguished musicians, the lecturer proceeded to name the most celebrated of modern time that the various countries of Europe had produced. The illustrations included compositions by Frederick the Great, of Prussia, the late King George, of Hanover, the Duchess of Orleans, Count Stanislas Wolanski, Lieutenant-General Sir Hope Grant, and others. A large audience displayed much interest in the subject of the lecture.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA.—The fourth Concert of the Kingston Philharmonic Society was given on Thursday evening, October 28, at the Town Hall. Mr. Ingram, who conducted so admirably at the earlier Concerts, has been succeeded by Mr. Barnes, of the 2nd W.I. Regiment, who proved himself fully equal in every respect to the exigencies of the post. The various items in the programme were well rendered.

KINGTON, HEREFORDSHIRE.—A successful Concert was given by the Choral Society on the 8th ult., assisted by the following soloists: Mr. and Mrs. Charlesworth, and Mr. C. W. Fredericks, of Hereford Cathedral. The first part of the programme consisted of Dr. Mason's Cantata, The Voyage, and the second part of part-songs, by Hatton, Gaul, and Richard, with songs and duets. The accompanists were Miss Dykes (piano) and Mrs. Mayor (harmonium); Mr. S. Mayor, Conductor.

LEICESTER.—A very interesting event took place in the Temperance Hall on Thursday, the 9th ult., a new Cantata, The Lord of Burleigh, having been performed, under the direction of Mr. J. Adcock, the Conductor of the Nottingham Choral Society. The work, which is the composition of Miss Frances Gill, met with great favour. The soprano and tenor parts were well sung by Miss Roby and Mr. Bryant; and the bass solos were ably rendered by the Rev. J. C. Crawford, M.A. Miss Brown gave most efficient aid in the two quartets and trio. The air for soprano, "Evermore she seems to gaze," was rapturously encored; and the song, "I can give no marriage present," was sung to perfection by Mr. Bryant. The composer met with an enthusiastic reception at the close of the performance. A miscellaneous selection occupied the rest of the evening.

LIMERICK.—On Thursday, the 2nd ult., the Limerick Musical Society gave a performance of Haydn's Creation with full orchestra, chorus, and organ. The choral numbers of the work were sung with great care and precision, speaking well for the skilful training of Mr. Joseph Smith, Mus. Bac., Conductor of the Society. The solos were given by local amateurs, all of whom sang with much ability; Mrs. Cusack especially distinguishing herself by her rendering of "On mighty pens." The orchestra consisted of a number of local players, aided by a contingent from Dublin and Cork, together with some members of the band of the 9th Infantry Regiment. Mr. N. P. Healy led, and Mr. Smith conducted.

LISKEARD.—On Tuesday evening, November 30, a Musical Entertainment was given in the Temperance Hall, by Mr. Edwyn Frith, assisted by Madame E. Frith, Miss Muriel Wood, and Mr. Arthur L'Estrange (pianist). Amongst the most important items in the first part were Blumenthal's "Venetian Boat Song," well given by Madame Frith; "Twickenham Ferry," sung in response to an encore by Miss Muriel Wood, and Handel's duet from Judas Maccabæus, "O lovely peace," in which the two ladies joined. In the second part Mr. Frith gave with spirit a song by Campana, "The Smuggler," and this being encored, he responded with Stephen Adams's "Midshipmite." Some further selections from Sullivan's Operettas were given, the "Ruler of the Queen's Nave," by Mr. Frith, and the duet, "Things are seldom what they seem" (Mr. and Madame Frith), proving thoroughly successful. Mr. Arthur L'Estrange gave three solos with much effect during the evening.

LOUTH.—On Tuesday evening, the 7th ult., the members of the Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. G. H. Porter (Organist of the Parish Church), gave a very successful Concert in the Town Hall, when Sterndale Bennett's May Queen was performed, preceded by a miscellaneous selection. The choruses were given with great precision, and the solos well sustained by Miss Honeybone, Miss Parratt, Mr. Gregory, Mus. Bac., and Mr. Swift. The band, assisted by Mrs. Porter (hon. pianist to the Society), was very efficient.

LUDLOW.—On Tuesday, the 14th ult., the members of the Ludlow Amateur Choral Society gave their first Concert of the season in the Assembly Rooms, when Haydn's Creation was performed. The principal vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M., Mr. Chas. Fredericks, and the Rev. W. D. V. Duncombe; Mr. R. Bartholomew conducted the band and chorus of ninety performers. Miss Bessie Holt gave an artistic rendering of the soprano solos, especially "With verdure clad," and "On mighty pens." Mr. Chas. Fredericks sang the tenor solos with much spirit, and the bass music was effectively rendered by Mr. Duncombe. The choruses throughout were given with precision, and the performance was a complete success. A short miscellaneous selection followed the Oratorio.

MANCHESTER.—The Athenæum Musical Society gave the second Concert of the season on Monday, the 6th ult., when, besides a miscellaneous vocal selection of secular music, a Cantata for orchestra and voices by H. Hofmann, entitled The Legend of the Fair Melusina, was performed. The Cantata is a work of great merit. The scoring is admirable, both for voices and instruments, and is characterised by abundant melody. That Dr. Hiles should have felt justified in attempting a composition so exacting is a proof that the instrumental forces at his command are becoming more and more efficient. The band is partially composed of amateurs, and only such professional assistance is obtained as is necessary to make up the complement of a complete orchestra. The vocal portion of the Cantata was admirably executed. The part of Melusina was sung by Miss Forshaw, and that of Count Raymond by Mr. Tomlinson. The song "The Linden's Whisper" the chorus of hunters, and the finale to the first part deserve special notice.—Dr. Bridge's Cantata Boadicea was performed on the 13th ult., under the direction of Mr. Dumville, of the Cathedral.

NEWBURY.—The Dedication Festival of the Parish Church was observed on Wednesday, the 8th ult. Berthold Tours's Te Deum in F was sung at 11.30. The Rev. Canon Carter, late Rector of Clewer, preached the sermon, after which Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer (Psalm 55) was most creditably rendered by the choir, the solo parts being taken by Masters Jewel and Bannister. The choir, under the able training of Mr. James H. Godding, is now in a high state of efficiency. Evening-song was sung at 7.30, the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis being by Garrett, and the anthem was repeated. The services were continued on the following Sunday.

NEWPORT, MONMOUTH.—An attractive musical performance was given at the Albert Hall by Mr. E. W. Perren's Choral Class, on Tuesday evening, November 30. The Rose of Salency, by Mr. Chalmers Masters, formed the first part of the programme; the second consisting of miscellaneous selections. The characters in the Cantata were sustained by Miss Julia Jones, Mrs. Davies, Mr. Robshaw, Mr. Richards, and Mr. White. The choruses were rendered with precision and effect; and the soloists acquitted themselves with very great credit. The accompaniment consisted of pianoforte and harmonium, at which Mrs. Ralph Brown and Miss Holdsworth presided respectively. Mr. Perren conducted. On Thursday, the 9th ult., the members of the Newport Sunday School Union Choral Society gave their annual Concert in the Albert Hall. The programme was miscellaneous. The soloists were Miss S. L. Thomas, Miss Emily Wilkes, Mr. R. Richards, and Mr. E. G. R. Richards. Mr. George Rickards, R.A.M., presided at the organ and pianoforte, and in the second part of the programme played a pianoforte Concerto of Weber's with much taste and feeling. Mr. E. Jenkins conducted.

NORWICH.—The members of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Union gave their nineteenth Concert on Thursday, the 9th ult., before a large audience, when Francis Howell's Cantata, The Song of the Months, was performed, with a miscellaneous selection for the second part. The principal vocalists were Miss Bessie Hill, Miss Alden, Mr. J. M. Hayden, and Mr. W. N. Smith. The Cantata was a great success, both band and chorus being very perfect. The band commenced the second part with Weber's Overture to Peter Schmolli, which was well rendered. The programme also included Handel's Largo, arranged for organ, pianoforte, solo violin, and strings, the solo part being well played by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre. Mr. Hayden sang with much taste Blumenthal's "My Queen," which was encored, and the other vocalists were much appreciated. The Choir sang Sloper's part-song, "The wild wind blows," with great effect. Dr. Bunnett was the Conductor; Mr. Walter Lain, Organist; and Mr. F. W. B. Noverre, leader of the band.

PETERBOROUGH.—The ninth season of the Peterborough Choral Society was inaugurated on Tuesday evening, November 30, in the Fitzwilliam Hall, when Handel's Oratorio, Judas Maccabæus, was performed. The Conductor was the Rev. W. Farley Wilkinson, M.A., and the performers numbered about 160. The Choral Society's band was augmented by professional players from London, Nottingham, Northampton, and other towns. The soloists consisted of two of the Peterborough Cathedral singers, Mr. Harper Kearton, Miss Trevena, Miss Maud Longhurst, and Mrs. J. Stott. Miss Trevena received a very cordial reception, and her rendering of "Wise men, flattering," was highly successful. Miss Longhurst was no less effective in the parts that fell to her share. "Arm, arm, ye brave" was sung with good effect by Mr. Grice (Peterborough Cathedral), and the singing of Mr. Harper Kearton was much admired. The choruses were rendered with great care, and the entire performance was thoroughly successful.

ST. HELEN'S, LANCASHIRE.—A Concert was given at the Brook Street Schools on Monday evening, the 13th ult., by the Congregational Church Choir, when Sir W. S. Bennett's May Queen was performed. The part of the May Queen was assigned to Miss Laura Haworth, and that of the Queen to Miss Mallinson; Mr. G. Barton sang the Lover's music, and Mr. Edward Grime that of Robin Hood. The work, on the whole, was creditably performed. The second part included Romberg's "Toy" Symphony, and the choir sang with good taste some part-songs; solos were also contributed by the principal vocalists. The Overture to the May Queen and the accompaniments were played by Miss A. L. Sharples (pianoforte), and Miss E. Gardner (American organ). Mr. J. T. Elliott conducted.

SHEFFIELD.—On Monday, November 29, the Hanover Chapel Choral Society gave its first Concert in Hanover Chapel. There was a very large attendance. Mr. Kirk presided at the organ, and played the Dead March in Saul, as a tribute of respect to the late Mr. Fifth. The programme consisted of Gounod's Messe Solennelle, which was sung in a very creditable manner, and Dr. Wesley's anthem, "The Wilderness," Miss Winkworth, Mrs. Roberts, Mrs. Haley, Messrs. Parkin, Bagshaw, Berry, and Woodhead sustaining the solos. Miss Winkworth also gave a new song "Lead, kindly light" (C. J. B. Meacham), which was encored, as was also Mr. Kirk's solo. Signor Guesi accompanied the Mass very efficiently on the pianoforte, and Mr. T. Morton, the Organist of the chapel, conducted.

SHREWSBURY.—The second of Mr. C. H. Forrest's subscription Chamber Concerts was given in the Raven Room on Wednesday, the 8th ult. The artists were Miss Emilie Lloyd, R.A.M. (vocalist), Mr. T. M. Abbott (violin), Mr. J. Owen (violinello), and Mr. C. H. Forrest (pianoforte). The programme opened with a Sonata for violin and piano (Op. 128) by Joachim Raff. The other concerted pieces were Beethoven's first Trio in E flat (Op. 1, No. 1), and some Nocturnettes for the same instruments by Gade. Mr. Abbott played two of Sarasate's Spanish Dances. Miss Lloyd's songs were artistically rendered and well received.

SOUTHAMPTON.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Handel's Messiah, on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult., in the Hartley Hall. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Poole, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Henry Pope. The choruses were exceedingly well rendered by Mr. Rowland's choir, and the band, which had been materially strengthened for the occasion, was thoroughly efficient. Mr. Alexander Rowland conducted.

SOUTHOPT.—The second of Mr. J. S. Watson's Subscription Concerts was given on Thursday evening, the 7th ult., when the programme was devoted to classical compositions, with Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Neruda as the executants of the instrumental portion; Madame Edith Wynne was the vocalist. Mr. Hodgson played the accompaniments to the songs with great skill; and throughout the evening the duties he had to perform were carried out in a highly efficient manner.

STOCKPORT.—The second Concert of the newly formed Musical Society was given on Wednesday, the 15th ult., at the Armoury. The Messiah was the work chosen for performance, the principal vocalists being Miss Fanny Bristow, Miss Louisa Bowmont, Mr. B. Arthur, and Mr. Thos. Brandon. The choir numbered seventy voices, and the orchestra, consisting of thirty-eight players selected from the bands of Hallé and De Jong, was led by Mons. L. Veerman. Mr. R. H. Wilson, Mus. Bac., presided at the organ, and the performance was conducted by Mr. Jos. Bradley, Mus. Bac.

TENBURY.—The Musical Society brought its tenth season to a close on November 24 with a performance of Handel's Messiah, in every respect worthy of the reputation of the Society and its painstaking Conductor, the Rev. J. Hampton. Both band and chorus acquitted themselves admirably. The solos were efficiently rendered by the Rev. H. Sayers, Mr. Fredericks (of Hereford Cathedral), Madame Dora Hope, and Miss Hilda Wilson.

TROWBRIDGE.—Mr. H. Millington has succeeded in organising a series of six monthly Concerts, the working expenses of which have been subscribed by the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood. The first took place in November, and the second on Tuesday, the 7th ult., when Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer, Gounod's Nazareth, and a selection of sacred music was given, with soli, band, and chorus for the first part of the programme. The second part was miscellaneous. The artists were Miss Kate Shackell, Mr. A. Crick, Mr. L. Waite (solo violoncello), Mr. W. Millington (leader), and Mr. W. Collins (accompanist). Mr. H. Millington conducted.

WALSALL.—On Tuesday evening, November 30, a Recital was given by Mr. Alfred Russell on the new organ in St. Matthew's Parish Church. The instrument, which is now complete, was originally built by Green, of London, in 1773; rebuilt and greatly improved by the elder Bishop, in 1844; and has now been again remodelled and enlarged. The proceedings opened with a short choral service, the prayers being intoned by the Rev. C. B. Gowan, and the choir singing the chorus, "Hallelujah," from Beethoven's Mount of Olives. During the service, Mr. Russell played a selection which was amply sufficient to illustrate fully the many beauties of the organ.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—The Harmonic Club gave the third and concluding Concert of its first season on October 5, to a large and appreciative audience of subscribers. Barnett's Ancient Mariner was the chief item in the programme. The Cantata was well rendered, some of the more difficult choruses being given with great precision and effect. The soprano part in the Cantata was excellently sung by Mrs. George Cotterell (Miss Isabella Carandini), the other parts being taken by competent amateurs. The miscellaneous portion of the programme included Gade's Spring's Message, and some unaccompanied part-songs, which were sung with much refinement and perfect balance of parts. The Concert was directed by Mr. Robert Parker, Organist of the Cathedral.

WOOLWICH.—Miss S. F. Mascall's winter Concert took place in the Town Hall, on Friday, the 3rd ult. Miss Mascall was assisted by a large number of her pupils and friends, all of whom were thoroughly successful, many, indeed, being greeted with overwhelming applause. The choruses composed (words and music) by Miss Mascall were very effectively rendered by the choir of young ladies.

WORCESTER.—Mr. Spark's second Concert was given in the Music Hall on the 14th ult., with Mr. de Jong's celebrated Manchester orchestra. The programme was varied by a few popular vocal airs, all charmingly sung by Madame Beasley. Keeping steadily in view the musical culture of the public, the programmes of Mr. Spark's Concerts have invariably offered examples of the great classic masters, while at the same time the stores of popular music have been largely drawn upon so as to give no room for complaints as to the ultraclassicism of the performances. The Concert commenced with Rossini's Overture, Le Barbier de Séville, and the programme included Haydn's grand Symphony (No. 12), both of which were beautifully rendered. Mr. Wadsworth (clarinet) and Mr. de Jong (flute) played solos, which were warmly applauded; and several orchestral selections completed a Concert which was keenly appreciated by a large audience.

In a notice of a Concert of the Birmingham Philharmonic Union, inserted in our last number, the name of one of the vocalists was printed Miss W. J., instead of M. J. Williams.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. W. O. Jones, Organist and Choir-master to the Church of St. John the Evangelist, King's Lynn.—Mr. F. J. Horton, to St. George's, Tylehurst, Reading.—Mr. William Sewell, to Dulwich College Chapel of Ease.—Mr. Charles F. Phillips, Organist and Choir-master to St. George's Parish Church, Dublin.—Mr. George Alexander, to St. Mark's, Lewisham.

CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Herbert J. Grover (Bass), to Christ Church, Southwark.—Mr. J. H. Sheldrake (Tenor), Mr. R. C. Laing (Tenor), and Mr. J. W. Holtum (Bass), to St. Thomas's Church, Upper Clapton.—Mr. Alfred Taylor (Alto), to Bristol Cathedral.

HOW TO LEARN TO PLAY THE PIANO

WELL. By One who has Taught Himself.

"How to Learn to Play the Piano Well" is the ambition and the despair of a very large number of our fellow subjects, who would welcome helpful hints on the coveted art. The author of the little brochure before us is, or rather was, not only one of those who have striven 'to play the piano well' but has taught himself to do it. His remarks have therefore the weight of experience. Numbers and numbers have gone through the usual drill prescribed by musical teachers, and have almost practised their fingers off without any encouraging results. 'How to Learn to Play the Piano Well' is intended to encourage those whose musical enthusiasm has been thus chilled."

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

THE ART OF PLAYING AT SIGHT. By One who has Taught Himself. Price One Shilling.

"Considering the number of persons who are taught to play the piano, it is astonishing how few can 'read' music. The author attributes this to the fact that no system is put forth by teachers. The method advocated in this little book is a novel one, and will undoubtedly produce success if persevered in."

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.'S
MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

REGISTERED.

"A very ingenious application of lamp-light to the desk of the pianoforte, harmonium, or organ has been registered by Mr. Thomas Ward. The lamp is so contrived, that it may be screwed on to any instrument, in a central position, so as to throw the full force of the light direct upon the music, the present system of side lights causing a waste of a great part of the illuminating power."—Illustrated London News.

LOCAL EXAMINATIONS IN ELEMENTARY MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

ESTABLISHED 1876.

Local Centres, under the care of Honorary Local Secretaries, have been established throughout the United Kingdom and the British Colonies.

The next Local Examinations in Elementary Musical Knowledge will take place on Friday, June 17, 1881, and will be open to persons of either sex.

National Prizes of the values of £5 and £3 will be open to Candidates in each Division, Senior and Junior. The Examiners are also prepared to undertake the adjudication of certain Local Prizes.

The entrance-fee for every Candidate not connected with an Institution enrolled in union with the College is Five Shillings. The entrance-fee for every Candidate connected with an Institution in union is One Shilling. Honorary Members of the College who may be officially connected with an Institution can obtain the enrolment of such Institution in union without fee.

The Local Examinations are conducted as follows: The Examination Papers, inclosed in a sealed packet, are opened by the Local Secretary in the presence of the Candidates, and, at the close of the Examination, the work of the Candidates is placed in a cover, sealed up in their presence, and sent the same day to the Registrar of the College.

The Examinations are conducted in two divisions, Senior and Junior. The Examination Paper in the Senior Division is devoted to Elementary Theory, with a few historical questions. The Examination Paper in the Junior Division is limited to questions in notation, time, clefs, signatures, scales, terms, &c., and (in the Honours Section only) one or two easy historical questions will be set. Candidates may take their choice of entering for the Senior or Junior Division without consideration of age. Candidates born before the 17th of June, 1864, are not eligible for Prizes or other Honours in the Junior Division, but they may obtain the ordinary certificates with "special mention."

Candidates must send in their names (in full), with the entrance-fees, to the Local Secretary for the District not later than May 7, 1881.

Copies of the Examination Papers set in 1877, 1878, 1879, and 1880, may be had from the College Bookseller, Mr. W. Reeves, 185, Fleet Street, London, E.C., price One Penny per page.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

INSTRUMENTAL AND VOCAL MUSIC.

ESTABLISHED 1878.

In response to a desire very generally expressed throughout the country for a system of Local Examinations in Pianoforte-Playing and Singing, the Academical Board has appointed Visiting Examiners on whose report Certificates are granted to efficient Candidates.

Local Centres may be visited by an Examiner at any time, by special arrangement with the Academical Board. Application should be made through the Hon. Local Secretary for the District at least three months before the proposed date of the Examination. The Subjects of Examination are as follows:—1. Pianoforte, Organ, or Harmonium Playing. 2. Solo-Singing. 3. Performance on any Orchestral Instrument.

Fees:—Each Candidate from a School or Institution in Union: Entrance Fee (each Subject), 10s. 6d.; Certificate Fee (each Subject), 2s. 6d. Otherwise: Entrance Fee (each Subject), £1 1s.; Certificate Fee (each Subject), 5s.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

INSTITUTIONS IN UNION.

Any Institution, College, School, Choir, or Society, the Principal, Director, or Secretary of which is an Honorary Member of Trinity College, London, may, subject to the approval of the Academical Board, be enrolled in union with the College. Institutions in union, amongst other privileges, may enter their members for all the Local Examinations, and obtain their Certificates, at greatly reduced fees. Applications for Enrolment should be directed to the Hon. Local Secretary of the Centre in which the Institution is situate, or, if there be no Centre, to the Secretary, Trinity College, London, W.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

HONORARY LOCAL SECRETARIES.

The Academical Board are about to appoint Hon. Local Secretaries to the following Local Centres of the College:—

TEXT BOOK of MUSIC

BY

HENRY C. BANISTER,

PROFESSOR OF HARMONY AND COMPOSITION AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

This Manual contains chapters on Notation, Harmony, and Counterpoint; Modulation, Rhythm, Canon, Fugue, Voices, and Instruments; together with exercises on Harmony, an Appendix of Examination Papers, and a copious Index and Glossary of Musical Terms.

We are bound to accord the highest praise to the work, which is so logically arranged throughout that reference to any special portion of it can be readily made. . . . The complete manner in which every department of the science is explained is highly creditable to the author; for not only does the book include a treatise on Counterpoint, Canon, Fugue, and Imitation, but some very able remarks upon Form in Composition, and upon the various musical instruments."—Musical Times, April, 1873.

FOURTH EDITION, Foolscape 8vo, price 3s. 6d.

HISTORY OF MUSIC

FROM THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN ERA TO THE PRESENT TIME.

FOR THE USE OF STUDENTS.

BY

REV. H. G. BONAVIA HUNT,

B.MUS., OXON.

"A well-arranged and really concise history of the subject. The book is divided into three sections, the first of which is a general review of musical epochs and events, while the second presents a series of chronometrical tables, and the third summarises a history of the art."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Hunt has the enviable power of giving much information in few words; he has, therefore, in this small volume, afforded valuable assistance to musical students preparing for competitive examinations, which they could not so easily obtain elsewhere."—Musical Standard.

"It only remains for us to express unqualified approval at the appearance of a work which seems to contain all that is wanted in a study of music."—Educational Times.

THE KING AND "PARSIFAL."

A QUAIN English poet, speaking of Fortune, says:—

To some she honour gives without deserving,
 To other some, deserving without honour;
 Some wit, some wealth; and some wit without wealth;
 Some wealth without wit; some nor wit nor wealth,
 But good smock faces, or some qualities
 By nature, without judgment, with the which
 They live in sensual acceptation,
 And make show only, without touch of substance.

These be the jade's freaks, or some of them, and to the list each of us might add a number more; but for a supreme illustration of what she can do in a whimsical mood we have only to look at his Majesty the King of Bavaria. There is no better example of the proverbial square peg in a round hole. Nature has made him a recluse; fate has put him at the head of a kingdom. Nature has made the gratification of personal tastes a passion; fate calls upon him to interest himself in the welfare of a people. He loves to commune with his own thoughts; but, with a crown on his head, needs must that he be perpetually followed by ministers who trouble him with their ideas. Fond of hunting wild animals in the depths of the forest and on the mountain side, he is hunted himself by curious sight-seers whenever duty obliges him to frequent the abodes of men; and a passionate lover of art, he chooses to indulge his taste for some of its forms by commanding representations at which he is the unique spectator. In good sooth, this exalted personage must wish that he had never been born to a throne. It may even be that he envies the state of his royal relative who, putting aside the trappings of rank, has lately set up practice as a medical man and finds the reward of science and benevolence in curing poor fellow-creatures of their ills. Yet there is no evil state without its compensation. The beggar that shivers along a wintry road derives quite as much gratification from a bowl of hot soup as a many-acred peer obtains from the donation of a Garter, and if Ludwig of Bavaria were not king, it would scarcely be in his power to indulge with present ease and freedom the personal tastes which are dearer than his crown. Being king, he can build a palace if he choose in the middle of a lake, and give his ministers the alternative of leaving him alone, or swimming for an audience. Being king, he can gather the entire company of a great opera-house for performance at any hour of a sleepless night; and being king, he has plenty of money wherewith to patronise, in better than barren form, what he conceives to be good in art. These privileges, it may be, reconcile him to his fate, while to the world generally they make him a very interesting character. The King of Bavaria is, as far as our knowledge goes, the only living representative, in a prominent way, of the old royal foster-fathers of art. Years ago they were common enough, for the reason that princes and great men were expected to take art under their sheltering wings, and, in turn, regarded it as a monopoly of their order. Literary men, painters, sculptors, musicians, all looked out for a munificent encourager, who, when found, esteemed them as ministers to his own personal and peculiar glory. Thus both parties were satisfied, and art, elevated above the influence of fickle and uneducated taste, flourished to an extraordinary degree. When, however, an artistic public began to shape itself among the mass of the people, the royal and noble patron found himself no longer a necessity. He had nursed art through its babyhood, and, the child being able to run alone, he was not so much wanted. It must be said for the royal and noble patron that the new conditions were accepted with admirable grace. He now comes in with the rest of us to the banquet of art and takes his ticket at the door on the usual terms. He is often outbidden by Thomas Smith or John Jones for a picture: the chances of a book being dedicated to him are certainly not greater than those enjoyed by others who are princes and great men in the writer's own world, and probably, as regards the reading of books, he subscribes to the nearest library. Of the old condition of things, King Ludwig is a survival. In him we see the munificent encourager as he was in the past, towering grandly above the common level because he has not only the will but the means to encourage art in a fashion at once princely and conspicuous.

The relation of King Ludwig to Wagner, as at once patron and friend, is of old standing, and need not be discussed here. We may remark, however, as characteristic of the "strange mutations" distinguishing the course of mundane events, that the combatant revolutionist of '48 is now bound hand and foot by bonds of interest, gratitude, and, no doubt, esteem to a foremost representative of the principle of royalty. In political questions Wagner has long been an extinct volcano. The impulse of early years towards an ideal good yielded in time to the caution that refuses to "kick against the pricks." Besides, Wagner may have discovered that his true mission had reference to art, and not to social or political economy. Be this as it may, he developed into an opportunist, and the man of the barricades, still cherishing, perhaps, the theories he once championed at the point of the bayonet, sits down with kings and pays court to an Emperor whose despotism is veiled, rather than tempered, by parliamentary forms. No one, we are sure, feels disposed to accuse the master of inconsistency. He was out of his place in the arena of political strife, and did well to extricate himself while as yet the consequences were repairable. Nevertheless, we cannot but discern something of the irony of fate in the present indebtedness of Wagner to a king. Suppose that no reaction had followed the movement of '48, and that Germany were now a confederation of republics, would "Parsifal" be looming in the near future? It does not seem so. United Germany is only ten years old, and its first sense of place and power has barely had the gloss taken off. National pride, in the particular form which honours national heroes of every kind, runs in a full, deep stream, while there is no apparent lack of the sensitiveness which safeguards a nation from humiliating itself before jealous rivals. Yet we have seen Wagner appealing in vain, not only to home-staying Germans, but to his countrymen all the world over, for the comparatively small sum of money needed to produce his latest work. The reasons for this cannot well be discussed here. Their investigation would take us too far a-field, but it must be said, and said with emphasis, that German indifference to the master's claims is far from creditable either to the patriotism of the people or their artistic eclecticism. In some sense the need for the beneficent intervention of King Ludwig, with his offer of £15,000 and the services of a great operatic establishment, is a reproach to music-lovers of whatever country. But it falls infinitely heavier upon Germany than upon any other, since Wagner is a great German master who labours first of all for his own people, and aims to give them a distinctively German art. We should have expected the nation to answer the appeal from Bayreuth with one voice, and quite irrespective of agreement or disagreement with Wagner's theories. When a man attains a certain eminence in any form of intellectual labour, it is everybody's interest and duty, not merely to stand out of his way, but to give him all possible help. It would be absurd, perhaps, to look for an admission of this from a heated controversialist, but in moments of calm the most virulent anti-Wagnerian must fain grant that artistic Germany has failed in its duty, and incurred a reproach nothing can wipe away. Bad policy is involved in the matter as well as bad taste. We might have thought the world grown too wise to play again the losing game of repressing new ideas either by active opposition, or scarcely less hostile indifference, to their full statement and examination. The experience of centuries shows that to be a game which never pays. You cannot stifle an idea any more than you can bottle up a sigh. Indeed, it is characteristic of this sort of warfare, that the more successful you seem to be the more pronounced is your ultimate defeat. When Galileo was forced, by the terrors of the Church, to deny his anti-Scriptural theory that the earth moved round the sun, the Church flattered itself upon a conquest. But Galileo went away muttering, "It moves all the same," and his words expressed the ultimate decision of science. If, therefore, a Wagner or anybody else comes before us with new thoughts, let him have a fair field for their expression, and let us give to what he says a full and frank consideration. If he be right, the benefit will be all the sooner enjoyed; if wrong, the error will be all the sooner exposed and made innocuous. It may be said that new theories are sometimes a mixture of truth and falsehood, and that in such cases, owing to the difficulty of discriminating between the good and the bad, it is safer to reject the whole. We are not of this opinion, because experience shows that the instinct of humanity, or whatever may be the mysterious power that regulates the broader issues of events, is wonderfully apt at assimilating the good and rejecting the bad. Many a time in the course of history truth has been proclaimed in exaggerated and distorted forms, which had their day and passed, leaving their valuable substance behind them. A few years since, for example, what was called pre-Raphaelism excited the ridicule, not without cause, of English artistic circles. Pre-Raphaelism has vanished, but no one denies that its influence upon contemporary painting remains great, or that it is an influence for good. On all accounts, therefore, the world should give new ideas a welcome, and even go out of its way to make room for them. Not to do so is as unwise in policy as it is unphilosophical in practice.

It will, no doubt, be said that German indifference to the exposition of Wagnerism as it is in "Parsifal" arises to some extent from the personality of Wagner himself. The statement is not without weight. Rightly or wrongly—we do not judge in this place—the master has offended many susceptibilities, and made his teachings hard to receive because of the manner in which they have been conveyed. It is impossible to ignore this fact. We may consider it as, in the abstract, very absurd to visit the sins of the messenger upon the message he brings, but human nature must be reckoned with, and, we should vainly look to see those who hold Wagner's person in small esteem do anything to further his artistic designs. At the same time the course that poor human nature suggests is not always the most dignified; wherefore, should "Der Ring des Nibelungen" be actually performed in London next summer, according to announcement, those who cannot approve of its composer's every act should try to conquer their prejudice, separate the man from his work, and judge the one, as it should be judged, without reference to the other. This is so plain a duty that, in most cases, we should apologise for pointing it out. But Wagnerism is so much Wagner, and the man himself has been a foremost combatant in so many battles fought over his own doctrines, that something like a vigorous effort is required to see that, after all, those doctrines are entitled to stand alone. Let us hope, with reference to the "Nibelungen" in London, that we may all successfully make this effort; help the projected enterprise in our several ways, pronounce a calm judgment upon what is set before us, and prove that we are in strict truth entitled to reproach the Germans for their indifference in the matter of "Parsifal."

MR. PEPYS THE MUSICIAN

BY FRANCIS HUEFFER.

II.

To do King Charles justice, English music at the beginning of his reign was not at its best, not in a condition, for instance, to rival the art as practised in Italy and France. There had been a time when this country could compare favourably with the two just named, when music was known to and practised by king and peasant; and it is a significant fact that the period when this was the case marked also the acme of English literature. That Shakespeare wrote for a public thoroughly imbued with the love of music one could tell, if there were no other sources to attest the fact. There are, indeed, many such sources. Queen Elizabeth, whom we may consider as the representative English lady of the period, was, as every one knows, a zealous and accomplished votary of the divine art, and proud of her musical talent no less than of her beauty. An ambassador of Queen Mary to her court has left it on record how he flattered Elizabeth by acknowledging her superiority on the virginals over her Scotch rival, his conscientious opinion in this respect for once coinciding with his diplomatic convenience; and it need not be said that the example of the great Queen was followed by her people, and more especially by her courtiers, with more or less vocation. Music towards the end of her reign had become a fad, even as the passion for Japanese fans and blue china is at the present day; the very desirable tendency towards beautifying human life being in both cases frequently made all but unrecognisable by the pranks of fashionable taste. When M. D'Olive (in Chapman's comedy of that name, printed in 1606), a fop of the period, intends to furnish his lodging in the proper style, this is how he goes to work: "Here shall stand my court cupboard, with its furniture of plate; here shall hang my base viol, here my theorbo, and here will I hang myself."

Unfortunately the early spring flowers of English song had been nipped in the bud by the political troubles which soon ensued. Music was on the losing side; it inspired the royalists with heart-stirring cavalier songs, and smelt evil in the nostrils of preaching iron-sides and canting puritan parsons. For a quarter of a century its public action was confined to the nasal piety of psalm-singing; and when at last Cromwell, more enlightened than his followers, wished to grant a license for a kind of Italian Opera, he had to lay stress on the foreign language which made at least any seduction by gentle words of love impossible. But although artistic music was in exile with the king over the water, religious and political fanaticism had not been able to extinguish the innate love of music amongst the English people. King Charles might have some reason to abuse English fiddlers and choristers, but it would have been difficult to find on the Continent a match to one of the examples of untutored musical skill which Mr. Pepys describes in the following sweet idyllic picture. The incident belongs to one of the diarist's pleasant trips to Epsom Wells, where, in his usual fashion, he has an eye and ear for everything, "riding through Epsom the whole town over, seeing the various companies that were there walking, which was very pleasant to see how they are there without knowing what to do, but only in the morning to drink waters. But, Lord, to see how many I met there of citizens that I could not have thought to have seen there; that they had ever had it in their heads or purses to go down thither." After having observed and moralised his fill, Mr. Pepys goes to have a breath of fresh air on the common, and there was "at a distance, under one of the trees, a company got together that sang. I at a distance took them for the Waytes, so I rode up to them and found them only voices, some citizens met by chance, that sung four or five parts excellently. I have not been more pleased with a snapp of musique, considering the circumstances of the time and place, in all my life anything so pleasant." This happened on July 27, 1663. One is inclined to ask what company of Englishmen, met by chance under the trees at Epsom on that or any day of the year 1881, would be able to perform four or five or, for that matter, one part songs, in excellent tune and time?

As to how this knowledge was acquired by the middle classes, Mr. Pepys also affords us ample information. With his accustomed unconscious skill, he describes how he, Mr. Hill ("my friend the merchant"), and two other gentlemen used to meet and discourse all varieties of sweet music in their quiet, unassuming way. There was no display, no audience, merely the four men worshipping the divine art in their simple way, and doing no doubt excellent work of its kind. By the special desire of Pepys the professional element was strictly excluded. At one time his friends had engaged an Italian master, one Signor Pedro, "a slovenly and ugly fellow," to superintend their studies once a week; but Mr. Pepys, with true tact, observed at once that this innovation would materially impair the character of these meetings. "I fear," he writes, "it will grow a trouble to me if we once come to bid judges to meet us, especially idle masters, which do a little displease me to consider. . . . It spoils, methinks, the ingenuity of our practice." The slovenly Pedro accordingly received his congé, and the four gentlemen went on as before, singing and playing being agreeably varied by discussion of artistic topics. On one occasion, Mr. Pepys, after supper, falls "into the rarest discourse with Mr. Hill about Rome and Italy," which that gentleman had visited probably in his commercial pursuits; on another the conversation touches upon a technical point all the more interesting to us as the graceful old dance form in question was at the time a living thing. "Then all to my house," Mr. Pepys writes on April 23 (Lord's Day), 1665, "where comes Hill, Andrews, and Captain Taylor and good musique; but at supper to hear the arguments we had against Taylor concerning a Corant, he saying that the law of a dancing Corant is to have every barr to end in a pricked crochet and quaver, which I denied, was very strange." If one may at this day decide such a question, it would appear that Mr. Pepys had decidedly the best of the argument. We all know that the Courante is a lively dance in 3-4 or 3-2 time, beginning with a short note at the end of the bar, and expressing, as Mattheson, writing a good many years after Pepys, discovered "Sweet hope, and in fact a combination of confidence, desire, and joy." But neither the Italian Corrente of Corelli nor yet the French Courante as developed by Couperin and the great Bach seem to bear out the law laid down by Captain Taylor. It is true that the works of all these masters are of a later type than that discussed at Mr. Pepys's house; moreover a "dancing Corant" as performed by military gentlemen of the seventeenth century may have had rules of its own. But of that it is at present impossible to judge.

The knowledge acquired at these gatherings and elsewhere Mr. Pepys was constitutionally prone to impart to others; and, as was natural in so well regulated a mind, his charity in this respect began at home. Mrs. Pepys was naturally the first person to be practised upon, and we have already seen how, after the drastic effect produced on her husband by some wind music, the lady was expected to learn that difficult branch of art. Unfortunately Mrs. Pepys's musical gift seems to have been of a limited kind, and her want of talent and remissness in practising gave rise to frequent conjugal troubles, as the Diary shows in more than one place. Nothing daunted, however, Mr. Pepys transferred his educational zeal to humbler objects, and in this direction fortune was more propitious to him. His boy (i.e., his page-boy), being possessed of a fine treble voice, was allowed to take part with the gentlemen before named in Ravenscroft's Psalms and other concerted music; and Mr. Pepys being a devoted admirer of the sex in every condition of life, the maids were not denied the privilege granted to the youth. One of these, of the name of Mary Ashwell, seems to have been a very promising pupil. She could, amongst other things, play on the triangle, a favourite instrument with Mr. Pepys. "Up to my tryangle," that gentleman writes de dato April 2, 1663, "where I found that, above my expectations, Ashwell has very good principles of musique, and can take out a lesson herself with very little pains." Such talent required encouragement even at the expense of a little money, not as a rule easily parted with by the provident although by no means stingy official. "March 16, 1663.—To my wife, at my Lord's (Sandwich) lodgings, where I heard Ashwell play first upon the harpsicon, and I find she do play pretty well, which pleaseth me. Thence home by coach, buying at the Temple the printed virginall book for her."

A still more interesting pupil seems to have been another of Mrs. Pepys's handmaidens, so well-known to the readers of the Diary as Mercer. Ladies of the present day will perhaps think it natural that the attention paid to the musical education of this girl by her indulgent master was for various reasons not altogether pleasing to the lady of the house, and, at least on one occasion, led to a "scene" thus philosophically referred to by the diarist: "Thence home; and to sing with my wife and Mercer in the garden; and coming in I find my wife plainly dissatisfied with me, that I can spend so much time with Mercer, teaching her to sing, and could never take the pains with her. Which I acknowledge; but it is because the girl do take musick mightily readily, and she do not, and musick is the thing of the world that I love most, and all the pleasure almost that I can now take; so to bed in some little discontent, but no words from me."

These facts, trifling in themselves, are of importance to us, showing as they do how far musical culture seems to have extended amongst the lower strata of English life in those days. Mr. Pepys's household was too modest to admit of superior or ornamental servants, and his spouse too practical a housewife to set great store by artistic accomplishments. Ashwell and Mercer were servant-girls pure and simple; they had to bake, and baste, and scrub to an extent at which the modern maid-of-all-work would stand aghast; and received a sound thrashing into the bargain when found wanting in their domestic duties. And yet their musical capabilities seem to have been of a kind which might put many a lady of the nineteenth century to the blush.

Even as Dante was led by his trusty guide from Inferno to Paradise, so we ascend with Mr. Pepys the social stair from kitchen and scullery to the exalted regions of an aristocratic drawing-room, to see how music fared there in the early days of the Restoration. We have already witnessed the musical accomplishments of the daughter of Lord Bellasis, and may here passingly notice a musical nobleman, the seventh Lord Chandos, apparently of puritanic tendencies; for he would go on singing psalms by the hour, "but so dully that I was weary of it" worldly Mr. Pepys adds. The musical aristocrat, however, who is most prominent in the Diary is Sir Edward Montague, created, by Charles II., Earl of Sandwich, to whom Pepys was distantly related, and to whom also he owed his first professional preferment, showing his gratitude by unflinching adherence to his patron through good and evil report. The Earl of Sandwich, as became an aristocratic amateur, was very decided in his opinions, and those opinions changing at times, Mr. Pepys's patience is occasionally tried by the vagaries of his friend. "And so followed my Lord Sandwich," he writes, November 16, 1665, "who was gone a little before me on board the Royal James, and there spent an hour, my lord playing upon the gitarr, which he now commends above all musique in the world"; and on another occasion "after dinner (Mr. Gibbons being come in also before dinner done) to musique, they played a good Fancy to which my lord is fallen again, and says he cannot endure a merry tune, which is a strange turn of his humour, after he has for two years flung off the practice of Fancies and played only fiddler's tunes."

The passage, it may be parenthetically remarked, throws some welcome light on an old musical term, the exact meaning of which is not very plain, and cannot be ascertained from the sources to which one naturally looks for information. In Mr. Grove's Dictionary, the term "Fancy" is altogether wanting, and Messrs. Stainer and Barrett, in their "Dictionary of Musical Terms" (abridged edition) somewhat vaguely state that it signifies "short pieces of music without words." This applies to a vast number of musical pieces, that referred to by Pepys amongst others. But how about another passage which, although sufficiently familiar, may once more be quoted in this connection. Speaking of Justice Shallow, in "Henry IV." (act iii., scene 2), Sir John Falstaff remarks, "A" came ever in the rearward of the fashion and sung those tunes to the overscutched huswives that he heard the carmen whistle, and sware they were his fancies or his good nights?" Here Fancy evidently refers to a tune to be sung or whistled as occasion required; certainly not to a concerted piece played by instruments. In the technical sense in which Pepys uses the word, one might feel inclined to identify it with what Hawkins calls the Fantasia (sic), and which, according to him, came into practice after the decline of the vocal madrigal. "When gentlemen and others began to excel in their performance on the viol, the musicians of the time conceived the thought of substituting instrumental music in the place of vocal; and for this purpose some of the most excellent masters of that instrument, namely, Douland, the younger Ferabosco, Carperario, Jenkins, Dr. Wilson, and many others, betook themselves to the framing compositions called Fantazias, which were generally in six parts, answering to the number of viols in a set or chest, as it is called in the advertisement in the preceding note, and abounded in fugues, little responsive passages, and all those other elegancies observable in the structure and contrivance of the madrigal." But then again, how could a composition for strings, abounding in little responsive passages and other elegancies, be mentioned as something the reverse of merry, and placed in contrast with fiddler's tunes? Mr. Pepys, although he does not explain the term, gives at least a hint as to its general meaning.

To return to our immediate subject, the general tenor of the Diary leads one to infer that the knowledge of music amongst the aristocracy, although less general than in Queen Elizabeth's reign, was at least more in vogue than later on, when Lord Chesterfield warned his son against the practice of the art as altogether unworthy the character of a gentleman. There was, however, in the time of the Restoration, amongst the better class of citizens, an enormous amount of that well-intentioned but extremely trying kind of amateur music with which we moderns are unfortunately too familiar. Mr. Pepys's sufferings from this social plague are expressed in the most amusing manner, and his terms of reprobation in the Diary are all the more emphatic as in real life he was too much of a diplomatist to give vent to his anger. "Went to hear Mrs. Turner's daughter play on the harpsicon," he writes, May 1, 1663; "but, Lord! it was enough to make any man sick; yet I was forced to commend her highly." The no doubt excellent reason for which Mr. Pepys thought it necessary to be civil to Mrs. Turner and her daughter is not supplied, as it is in another case referred to in the following passage, which, besides being very amusing, is also instructive, in so far as it illustrates the practices and antics of a French singing-master two hundred years ago: "July 24, 1663.—They (Mr. and Mrs. Bland) had a kinswoman they call daughter in the house, a short, ugly, red-haired slut, that plays upon the virginalls and sings, but after such a country manner, I was weary of it, but yet could not but commend it. So by-and-by, after dinner, comes in Monsieur Gotier, who is beginning to teach her: but Lord! what a droll fellow it is to make her hold her mouth, and telling this and that so drolly would make a man burst, but himself I perceive sings very well. Anon we sat down again to a collation of cheesecakes; tarts, custards, and such-like, very handsome." Cheesecakes, and custards, and tarts, following, it should be added, upon a dinner got up "very finely and great plenty," no doubt atoned for much that was faulty in the performance of Mr. Bland's adopted daughter, ugly and red-haired slut though she might be.

So much about the practice of music in the early days of the Restoration.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. IX.—SCHUBERT (concluded from page 14).

ON July 3, 1822, Schubert took up his parable and spake a "dark saying," in the form of a dream-story. Here it is:—

"I was one brother amongst a number of brothers and sisters. Our father, our mother, were worthy people. I was deeply and fondly attached to the whole circle. My father took us out one day on a party of pleasure, to a favourite spot. My brothers were in a state of great glee, but I was wretched. Well, my father came up to me and bade me enjoy the delicacies before me, but I could not. Whereupon my father, in a rage, banished me his presence. I turned away my steps, and with a heart full of boundless love for those who despised it, I wandered into the distant country. For long years I felt myself preyed on alternately by the greatest pain and most fervent love. Then the news of my mother's death was brought to me. I hastened away to see her, and my father, softened by affliction, did not stop my going then. I gazed on the dead body of my mother. My eyes filled with tears. Like the good old past days, to which my departed mother thought we should carry back our memories, as she did in her lifetime, she was lying dead before me. And we followed her poor body with mourning and woe, and the coffin sank into the earth. My father once more took me into his favourite garden; he asked me if I liked it. But the garden was distasteful to me, and I dared not trust myself to say anything. My father, kindling, a second time asked me if I liked the garden. I trembled and said 'No.' Then my father struck me, and I fled. A second time I turned my steps away, and with a heart full of boundless love for those who scorned it, I once more went forth a wanderer in the world. For many, many long years, I sang my Lieder. If I would fain sing of love, it turned to pain; if I would sing of pain, it turned to love. Thus, I was divided between love and sorrow. And once I was told of a pious maiden who had just died. A crowd gathered round her tomb, and in the midst of that crowd many youths and old men wandered for ever, as though in bliss. They spoke gently, as though dreading to awake the maiden. Heavenly thoughts seemed, like light sparks, to be for ever darting on the youths from the maiden's grave, and a gentle rustling noise was heard. I felt bashful and ashamed to walk there. 'It is by a miracle only,' said the people, 'that you are conducted to this circle.' But I advanced to the grave with slow steps, full of devotion and firm faith, my eyes fixed on the grave, and before I could have thought it possible, I found myself in a circle from which there arose spontaneously a wonderful strain of music, and I felt the bliss of eternity concentrated, as it were, into one moment. I saw, too, my father, reconciled and loving towards me. He clasped me to his arms and wept. But I wept more sorely than he."

This strange story was found among Schubert's papers after his death, but no clue to its meaning has ever been discovered. That it refers to himself we may well believe; but what is meant by the "favourite garden" wherein he could take no delight, and, above all, what do the dead maiden, the grave, the circle of happy youths, and the spontaneous music signify? For an answer to these questions we vainly ask the master's biographers and commentators, who have nothing to tell us. But though the dream may lack interpreters, we see through it into the dreamer's soul, and get some idea of its vague longings and its deep unrest. Schubert's real world was the world of vision, and if in any sense he deserved to be called "unpractical," it was because he resembled nothing so much as a man who, pursuing a beautiful phantom, stumbles heedlessly among the things lying in his path.

The year 1825 was a comparatively bright time in Schubert's life. Beyond the charming environs of his native city, and some portions of Styria, he had seen little of what nature has to show in the way of beauty. With a light heart and bright hopes, therefore, he set out in the early spring for the Austrian Tyrol, and joining his friend Vogl, wandered through the lovely and majestic scenery of the Salzkammergut to Salzburg. During this tour Schubert was prodigal of work. Inspired by what he saw, and animated by the new life he led, his fertile genius poured forth song after song. Happily, while so engaged, he did not omit writing from time to time to absent friends; and a few of his letters have been preserved—imperishable records of transient happiness. At Linz he expected to meet an old schoolfellow named Spaun, but found, on reaching the upper Austrian city, that he had removed to Galicia. The disappointment was great; but Schubert is hardly recognised in the buoyant, humorous spirit which animates his expression of it in a letter at once despatched to his friend:—

"You may well imagine my uncommon vexation in being obliged in Linz to write a letter to you in Lemberg. Deuce take that abominable duty which separates friends from one another, when they have scarce sipped the cup of friendship. Here I am sitting still in Linz, half dead with the melting heat and perspiration. I have a large number of new songs and you not here! Are you not ashamed? Linz without you is a body without a soul, a rider without a head, broth without salt. If I didn't get good beer at Jägermaiers and decent wine at the Schlossberg, I should go and hang myself on the Parade out of grief for the soul of the Linzers which has taken wing and flown away. You see I am utterly out of sorts with the general run of Linz folk, whereas in your mother's house, surrounded by your sisters . . . I am thoroughly happy; a faint gleam of their spirits seems to radiate from the material form of an occasional Linzer. Only I fear this light will become less by degrees, and then I shall fall to pieces in sheer despair. After all, it is downright misery to see everything ossified into 'fade' prose, whilst the majority of humdrum people jog on in perfect complacency as long as they can comfortably slide over the quagmire into the abyss below."

In a subsequent letter to his parents we read: "Spaun's migration to Lemberg is a subject of great regret to his family. I read some letters which he had written from Lemberg. They were in a very melancholy vein and showed an intense longing for home. I wrote to him at Lemberg chiding him for his weak, womanish behaviour, although probably in his place I should have been still more lugubrious." The "chiding" referred to ran as follows:—

"For the rest don't let your hair grow grey with misery at being so far away from us. Brave the adverse fate. Let your gentle spirit expand like a flower-garden, that you may diffuse the warmth of life in the cold North, and show your divine origin wherever you go. Contemptible is the grief which stealthily creeps upon a noble heart; cast it away from you, and tear to pieces the vulture which is gnawing at your soul."

The letter to his parents mentioned above was written a little later from Steyr in answer to one of complaint about his long silence. It opens in a vein as happy as that from which quotation has just been made. Every line shows that the master was enjoying a period of mental and physical well-being:—

"I am now once more in Steyr, having spent six weeks in Gmunden. The environs are perfectly lovely—I am enchanted with the country; and the dwellers there, especially the excellent Traweger (Traweger was a merchant who loved music and had a 'splendid grand piano'), have made me deeply sensible of, and grateful for, all the good they have done me. At Traweger's I was just as at home—not the slightest constraint or ceremony. . . . My new songs out of Walter Scott's 'Lady of the Lake' were very warmly approved. My audience expressed great delight at the solemnity of my hymn ('Ave Maria') to the Blessed Virgin. It seems to have imbued the minds of listeners with a spirit of piety and devotion. I believe I have attained this result by never forcing on myself religious ecstasy, and never setting myself to compose such hymns and prayers except when I am involuntarily overcome by the feeling and spirit of devotion; in that case devotion is usually of the true and genuine kind."

Special attention need hardly be called to this last sentence. It at once claims regard as a valuable illustration of Schubert's method, and as another proof of the fact that the true composer is not a manufacturer of music, but one who speaks as he is moved by the promptings of his inner nature. That there are so many composers who, in this sense, are false, arises from the mistake of supposing that the spirit of music is always at command.

Continuing his remarks upon the songs from Scott, Schubert wrote:—

"I intend to have some other arrangement with the publication of these songs, the present one inviting so little attention. They must have the illustrious name of Scott on the preface, and thus make people more curious; with the addition of the English text, they might help to make me better known in England, if only once I could make some fair terms with art purveyors; but in that matter the wise and beneficent management of the Government has taken care that the artist shall remain for ever at the mercy of any miserable huckster."

Referring to a performance on the pianoforte of some of his own works, Schubert next gives us a glimpse of his style, and a hint as to what he thought of the "higher development" then in vogue:—

"Some assured me that the keys under my hands sounded like singing voices, which, if it be true, is a delightful compliment, as I cannot endure that execrable hacking, peculiar to even distinguished pianoforte-players. It neither tickles the ears nor moves the feelings."

The letter closes with some references to various members of the family, and these ought on no account to be passed over. They show us the man where the man is most likely to be seen au naturel:—

"Give my kindest love to Ferdinand (his brother) and his wife and children. He knuckles down still, I suppose, to the landlord of the 'Kreuz' (a public-house frequented by the Schubert family), and can't get rid of Dornbach; that man certainly must have been ill seventy-seven times, and nine times thought himself at death's door—that is if death be the worst thing that can befall us poor mortals. Could he only see these divine mountains and lakes, the look of which threatens to crush or to swallow us, he would be so enamoured of the petty life of men as to esteem it a great happiness to be restored to strength and energy. What of Carl? (another brother, by profession a landscape-painter). Will he travel or stay at home? He has now a great deal to do, for a married artist is bound to produce pieces from nature as well as copies; and if both kinds succeed he is doubly to be praised, for that is no light matter to attain to. I renounce it on that account. Ignaz is just now, I suppose, at Hollpein's, for being there morning, noon, and night, he can't very well be at home. I still marvel at his perseverance (Ignaz was, apparently, a suitor at Hollpein's), only one doesn't know for certain whether that be real merit or not—whether heaven or the other place be what such conduct deserves. Schneider (a brother-in-law) and his wife are on the look out for the little Schneider or Schneiderin that is to be. They must take care that the Schneiders be as the sand on the sea-shore for multitude, and that no swaggerer (Aufschneider) or clipper of reputation (Zuschneider), or cutpurses or bravos (Gurgelabschneider), get the upper hand."

If the foregoing be a fair sample of Schubert among his family, we could not desire to see him in a more amiable light. With a pleasant word all round; a little joke here and there on peculiarly domestic matters and some harmless play about a familiar name, our Schubert pleases us en famille quite as much as when before what was to him the great world.

Schubert's sympathy with the beauties of nature and his appreciation of the fair scenes through which he passed are well expressed in a letter to Ferdinand written after his return from Salzburg to Gmunden. In describing the country, enthusiasm makes him almost eloquent, while not a few graphic touches give life and vigour to the picture. Respecting the approach to Salzburg, we read:—

"From Neumarkt, which is the last stage before Salzburg, one gets the first glimpse of the snow-covered tops of mountains emerging from the Salzburg valley. About an hour from Neumarkt the country is exceedingly beautiful. The Waller-See, which pours forth its clear blueish-green water, lights up this fair scene in an enchanting way. The situation is very lofty, and from that point one goes by a constant descent as far as Salzburg. The mountains appear higher and higher; the Untersberg, with its ghosts and legends, peering above the rest. The villages show signs of the wealth of former days. In the commonest peasants' houses one finds on all sides marble window-ledges, sometimes even staircases of red marble. The sun darkens, and the gloomy clouds lower over the mountains like children of the mist, but they touch not the peak of the Untersberg—they glide past as though afraid of its dreadful inmates. The far-off valley, which is studded with isolated castles, churches, and peasants' huts, becomes plainer and plainer to the enchanted eye. Towers and palaces gradually appear; at last one drives by the Kapuzinerberg, where the mighty rampart of rock rises perpendicularly from the roadside, and looks grimly down upon the wayfarer. The Untersberg, with its attendant mountains, becomes gigantic; its majesty seems almost to crush us. And now our road lies through some beautiful avenues to the town itself. Fortifications, formed of massive square stones, surround this beautiful seat of the ancient Electoral Princes. The gates of the town announce by the inscriptions over them the departed power of the Papacy. Nothing but houses of four or five stories fill the rather wide streets, and, passing the wonderfully decorated house of Theophrastus Paracelsus, one goes over the bridge of the Salzach, which roars along in dark and sullen majesty."

It must be admitted that, for an unaccustomed hand, the foregoing bit of description is not at all bad work, though weakened by translation, while those who have travelled over the same ground will at once recognise its fidelity. Schubert goes on to speak of the town, which was not then the flourishing place it now is:—

"There are but few inhabitants, many of the buildings are empty, many are inhabited by one, at most from two to three families. Grass grows on the squares and in the public places, of which there are many very fine ones, and also between the pavement stones, so little are they trodden upon."

Of an old Salzburg worthy we read:—

"From the cathedral we went to the monastery of St. Peter, where Michael Haydn resided. . . . Here, as you know, is the monument of M. Haydn. It is very fine, but badly placed in an obscure out-of-the-way corner. . . . Haydn's head is contained in an urn. I thought to myself, may thy pure and peaceful spirit hover around me, dear Haydn, and if I can never become like thee, peaceful and guileless, at all events none on earth has such deep reverence for thee as I have. Sad tears fell from my eyes, and we went on."

Schubert, of course, ascended the Nonnenberg, which rises over the very streets of the beautiful city, and gazed enraptured upon the still more beautiful valley through which the river runs. In describing the scene, he is again eloquent:—

"Imagine to yourself a garden several miles in extent, in which one can see through the trees numberless castles and country houses; imagine a river creeping along like a serpent in twining folds; think of meadows and plains covered, like so many carpets, with the loveliest colours, and then the grand massive rocks which encircle them like bands; and lastly, miles of huge trees ranged in rows—all this girt about by a range of the loftiest mountains, as though they were sentinels watching over the exquisite valley. Imagine all this and you have some faint conception of its unspeakable beauty."

The most remarkable thing about this Salzburg letter is that the name of Mozart does not once appear in it. At the birthplace of the great composer, Schubert would, one might have thought, be full of him, whereas, as a matter of fact, he seems to have forgotten him altogether. Schubert could go and weep at the tomb of a comparatively insignificant man like Michael Haydn, why then had he no look or sign of recognition for Mozart? It is true that in 1825 Salzburg was not one vast shrine dedicated to the great composer. There was no statue on the Platz near the cathedral, no gilded inscription on the front of this or that house showed where Mozart was born or had lived, the public chimes did not ring out his melodies, busts and portraits were not visible in every second shop, nor did a Mozart museum rank high among the "lions" of the place. But Schubert must have known that his illustrious predecessor had made the little city immortal, and that its site was, to every musical pilgrim, holy ground. We lose ourselves in vain conjectures as to his silence. It is a puzzle hard indeed to solve.

In a subsequent letter Schubert describes with much force the mountainous scenery of the Austrian and Bavarian Tyrol, but after what has been already quoted we need only give one characteristic extract, having reference to the Pass of Luezi:—

"After painfully and slowly crawling over a high mountain, huge mountains before us and on either side of us, so that one might think the world in these parts had been nailed up with boards, one looks down, after having scaled the highest part of the mountain, into a fearful ravine, and then, for the first time, one feels a palpitation of the heart. Recovering a little from the first shock, one sees the mighty ramparts of rock, which, in the distance, seem to shut up like a blind alley, and then one puzzles one's head in vain thinking where there can possibly be any outlet or passage. Amidst these awful scenes of nature man has sought to perpetuate the memory of his still more dreadful inhuman actions. For here it was where the Bavarians on one side of the Salzach, and the Tyrolese on the other, the river roaring deep between them, inflicted that dreadful murderous slaughter, whilst the Tyrolese, secreted in the holes of the rocks, uttering their hellish cries, fired on the Bavarians, who were striving to win the Pass, and fell wounded into the abyss without seeing whence the shots proceeded. This shameful action, which was continued for several days and weeks, they tried to mark by building a chapel on the Bavarian side of the Pass, and erecting a red cross in the rock on the Tyrolese side. These emblems were partly intended as memorials, and partly to appease the wrath of heaven by sacred mementoes. O glorious Christ, how many wicked deeds must Thy sacred image appear to sanction. Thou Thyself, the cruellest memorial of human guilt, men set up Thy image as though they would say 'Lo! with insolent feet we have trampled upon the most perfect creation of the great God; should we feel compunction of heart in annihilating the noxious insect called man?'"

All the soul of Schubert seems to come out in this passionate invocation, and it is a soul we can love.

In 1827—the year before his death—Schubert spent another happy time out of Vienna, the place of his sojourn being Grätz, where he was the guest of Dr. and Madame Carl Pachler. The Pachlers were very musical as well as very hospitable people; and it was a curious circumstance that, having been deprived of Beethoven's expected company by that master's death, they prevailed on Schubert to take the vacant place—he who was so soon to follow Beethoven into another world. Schubert had no previous acquaintance with Madame Pachler; but he enjoyed himself among his new friends most thoroughly, the return to Vienna bringing on a fit of depression which shows itself with no less pathos than plainness in a letter addressed to his late host:—

"I already begin to find out that I was far too happy and comfortable in Grätz, and that Vienna and I do not exactly suit one another. Certainly, it is rather big, but on that account empty of all heart, sincerity, candour, genuine thoughts and feelings, rational talk, and utterly lacking in intellectual achievements. One cannot ascertain exactly whether people are really clever or stupid, there's such a deal of petty, poor gossip—real cheerfulness one seldom, if ever, comes across. It is possible, no doubt, that I have myself to blame, being so very slow in the art of thawing. In Grätz I soon learned to appreciate the absence of all artifice and conventional ways. Had I stayed longer I should, of course, have been more profoundly penetrated with the happiness of such perfect freedom from constraint. Coming to particulars, I shall never forget the happy time passed with your dear wife, the sturdy Pachleross and the small Faust."

How clearly, through these words, do we see the man weary of struggles with a cold and heartless world, and longing for rest from petty cares, yet called to face trouble once more after a blessed taste of sympathy and love.

Only one letter of Schubert's dated in the fatal year 1828 has come down to us, and that is, characteristically, an appeal from the composer on behalf of his brother Carl, the painter. It is addressed to Herr Anselm Hüttenbrenner, of Grätz:—

"You will be surprised at my writing at all. So am I, but, if I do write, it is from motives of self-interest. Now, just listen. The place of drawing-master at the Normal-Hauptschule at Grätz is, I see, vacant, and candidates are summoned. My brother Carl, whom you possibly know, would like to get the post. He is a clever landscape-painter as well as a good draughtsman. If you could help me in this matter I should be eternally obliged to you. My brother is a married man with children; to obtain regular salaried employment would be extremely agreeable to him. . . . I repeat my request, and only bear in mind that any kindness done to my brother I look on as done to myself."

Ten months later Schubert died, and earth was the poorer for the loss of a good and gifted being, who certainly was "no one's enemy but his own," and who was his own enemy only in a very modified sense. Schubert needed to be taken by the hand and led, as a child, through the mazes of a difficult and unsympathetic world. There was no one to do this, and, like a child, he often wandered. But from the extracts we have given it is easy to gather that the tenderness and beauty of his nature rivalled the tenderness and beauty of his music.

THE FATHER OF THE SYMPHONY.

In the old Sinfonia the Adagio was followed by the Finale, originally, as we have seen, a repetition, at an enhanced speed, of the first movement, which eventually developed into a new and independent piece, retaining, however, throughout the character of a bright and cheerful humour. In addition to these three orthodox movements, we find that Haydn, as in his first quartet and also in his first symphony, has introduced a minuet, and it is usual to credit the composer with the merit of the introduction. Dance-movements are, however, to be met with by the side of Allegro, Adagio, and Presto in "sonatas" of a more remote period; and it is doubtless the novel artistic treatment bestowed by Haydn upon this special dance-movement, which has led to its permanent adoption both in the quartet and the Symphony. Here, again, it was the Suite, to which we have already referred, which furnished the suggestion, or rather, perhaps, its derivative, the Cassazione or Divertimento, a combination of numerous movements, embracing both Sonata and Suite, which has found its most perfect illustration in Beethoven's Septet. The reason why Haydn should have chosen the Minuet as a concomitant to the three recognised movements of the Sonata-form is not far to seek. It was the favourite dance with the aristocracy of his time, and the strains of a genuine Minuet still call to our mind the somewhat comical grandezza of the period. But the Minuet, if not indeed adopted by the peasantry, was also much in vogue with the townspeople. Haydn himself had gained his early popularity in these latter circles by writing minuets. Thus, already in his first sonatas, Haydn's Minuet embodies the national joviality of the Viennese, while at the same time it retains the distinct characteristics of the dance movement, as regards its artistic form. In this manner Haydn, with consummate skill, raises in his minuets complete pictures of the dance, and of popular life with its joyous humour, as well as its more sentimental emotions. In the "trio," on the other hand, we are throughout the whole range of Haydn's minuets more especially reminded of the Volkslied proper, with its combined cheerfulness and melancholy.

Notwithstanding, however, its attractive form and fascinating humorosity, it must be admitted that the minuet (as well as the Scherzo into which Beethoven developed it) has ever retained more or less the character of an inserted piece, intended to mediate, as it were, between two movements of an opposite mental disposition, to prepare the mind of the listener for the reception of a new tone-picture, the Finale. Regarded thus, the minuet, as introduced by Haydn, appears in its true significance and importance. It preserves the natural division into three parts of the symphony, as a "drama in tones." If proof of this were needed, it becomes apparent if we look at the various positions which the composer assigns to his minuets. Thus, in his symphonies, he occasionally places it before the adagio, whenever the weighty nature of the first movement requires a preparatory settling of the mind for the reception of the next. In his pianoforte sonatas, again, the minuet, not unfrequently, forms the conclusion. It is never placed at the commencement of a composition, and this confirms it in its character of an insertion or episode.

The Finale, as we have seen, usually took the form of a Rondo, originally a round dance accompanied by song, the dancers singing alternatively a verse after the same melody. Thus, in the Finale, the principal theme becomes more prominent still than in the first movement, the minor motivi are more subdued, and as no repetition takes place, the grouping of ideas is effected rapidly, and every component part of the movement hastens to be in its place to assist at the final crowning of the edifice. By the constant recurrence of the principal theme, intended to prepare for the harmonious conclusion of the whole, it became necessary for the composer to present it in a new aspect at each time of its appearance, without perceptible harmonic or contrapuntal effort; for in those days it was still held to be imperative that a musical composition should dismiss the listener in a jovial frame of mind. Hence in the Finale the best opportunity was afforded to the musician for the display of this technical mastery over his art, and of his mental and psychological resources. Playful humour, almost unbounded merriment, have therefore generally been represented in this movement, and for the expression of these the musical composer has an excellent auxiliary in the technical portion of his art, i.e., in being able playfully to surmount the greatest contrapuntal obstacles and to solve, without apparent effort, profoundest problems of the art.

It is not surprising, then, that the Finale should soon have become the chosen arena for the special display of polyphonic art, and that here, moreover, the treasury of German contrapuntal skill should have been largely drawn upon and made use of in the most satisfactory and refreshing manner. Hence the Finales of Haydn are characterised from the first by such free play with technical difficulties, the deliberate crowding together of themes, their sudden appearance and relinquishment, the drollery in misleading the listener in his expectation of their re-appearance, and numerous similar devices, all of which prove, at the same time, how much the composer had profited by the study of Fux, Mattheson, and Ph. E. Bach. In a symphony, in D major, from the year 1762, the composer has even made use of fugal writing in the Finale which, indeed, at several stages of the progress shows us a very grave countenance, whereas towards the conclusion all is changed into joyous exultation, and we see a merry crowd of youthful dancers flitting past our eyes. For if it was no longer the dance merely that these compositions intended to represent, but a genuine musical entertainment; still, it was entertainment, and no more than was looked for in the drawing-rooms or "chambers" of that period. His Serene Highness the Prince Esterhazy, too, desired in the first place to be amused by the performances of his orchestra. Yet the Prince was a man of some cultivation, who appreciated art, and who, moreover, had inherited the true Hungarian love for music. And this leads us to consider a point of importance in Haydn's career, viz., the favourable circumstances in which his good fortune had placed him at a decisive period, and which enabled him steadily and harmoniously to develop his talent, to increase his knowledge and the power of its practical application.

"At last I was accepted and received as his capellmeister by his Serene Highness the Prince Esterhazy, where I desire to live and to die." Thus Haydn wrote in a short autobiography which the publishers of a work entitled "Das gelehrte Oesterreich" (Learned Austria) had requested him to furnish in the year 1776, he being then already considered one of the most celebrated composers of his native country. In directing our attention for awhile upon this position of our composer with his princely patron, we shall at the same time be furthered in our efforts to establish his claim to the fatherhood of modern Symphony.

At their residence at Eisenstadt, in Hungary, the Princes Esterhazy maintained an orchestra of modest proportions, which, however, under Haydn's direction gradually assumed greater importance and perfection. Prince Nicolaus, whom our composer served for nearly thirty years, and who, on his part, proved himself as faithfully devoted to the latter's genius, was indefatigable in his appreciation of the productions of his capellmeister, and had thus become actually one of those "Herren," whom Beethoven had in his mind when in the year 1809 he received a call to Cassel, and of whom he expected the payment of an annuity for the purpose of the "invention of new works." Prince Nicolaus was, in fact, what these imaginary gentlemen might have been in Beethoven's case, "co-ordinator of every more important new work" written by our composer under his auspices. His love for art and science far exceeded his well-known predilection for the display of princely splendour. And here the words may be cited which were spoken to Griessinger, and in which Haydn has set his patron a significant memorial: "The Prince was satisfied with all my compositions; I met with encouragement; as chief of an orchestra I was enabled to try experiments, to observe what might produce effect or weaken it; thus I could improve, add, curtail, risk. Set apart from the world, with nobody near me to shake the faith I had in myself, or to perplex me with doubts, I was bound to become original." Although this has reference chiefly to his technical acquirements in his art, and his power of orchestration, while the most important question of the artistic form into which his compositions were cast had, without all these advantages, become established in the simple framework of the quartet and the pianoforte sonata, there can be no doubt that the facts related in the above words have an important bearing upon the development of instrumental music generally. Before we can attempt, therefore, to analyse the ultimate artistic, i.e., poetic, value of the symphonic form, brief reference must be made to Haydn's masterly treatment of the orchestra.

Again, consulting Griessinger's biographical notices, we learn that during his stay with the schoolmaster at Hainburg, to which we have previously referred, the boy Haydn "received instruction in the use of nearly every wind and string instrument, and even in the beating of the kettle-drums." At the Capellhaus in Vienna, too, according to his own statement, he had enjoyed the advantage of tuition by "very competent masters on various instruments." He was, moreover, as we have seen, frequently obliged by sheer necessity to take part in the performances at popular dances and festive occasions of the smaller Viennese bands. He was thus as much at home with the orchestra as ever practised composer had been. Nevertheless, and however well-adapted for the orchestra his early minuets may have been, he has, in a measure, but followed the example of predecessors as regards grouping and colouring of the instrumental body, and his individual share of merit in this respect has been perhaps less "original" than the final adoption on his part of the sonata-form as the fundamental framework for the entire range of modern instrumental music.

We have always sympathy with a man who has been placed in a position which compels him to perform duties of the nature of which he is profoundly ignorant; but cannot say that we have any sympathy with one who deliberately places himself there. In times gone by we recollect being asked by the musical critic of a journal if we could give him any information about "dominant octaves"; and, also, if we would tell him how it happened that horns always played in the key of C, and yet sounded right with the other instruments. Even those papers not devoted exclusively to music which are published in London would scarcely now, however, rest satisfied with the services of such writers on the art; but it is evident that they still linger in the country. Of this fact we could furnish many instances; for usually when any of the standard works are performed, the person who "does" the musical notices evidently feels bound to review them. The following opinion upon Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, extracted from a paper now before us, will sufficiently illustrate our position: "The Jupiter Symphony is in itself a masterpiece of instrumental production. There is a peculiar richness in the harmonies, obtained by the use of frequent chromatic chords. The Symphony embraces four movements, and each successive change has a telling effect, all the subjects being worked well together." How much more satisfactory would it be if such critics were to confine themselves to general praise of the work; and, if it were necessary to extend the notice, to enlarge upon the dresses of the "fair" portion of the audience. Certainly non-musical listeners are quite as competent to judge of the beauties of the "Jupiter" Symphony as the writer of this notice; and musical ones, who are conversant with Mozart's score, will have discovered long ago that the "peculiar richness of the harmonies" is by no means produced by "the use of frequent chromatic chords."

ALIGHTING at a railway station a few months ago, our attention was directed to an alarming noise from a crowd of persons surrounding a carriage at the forward end of the train; and on inquiring the cause—fearing that a serious accident had happened—we were informed that it was "only the Salvation Army." Following this "army," we were surprised to find that, at the entrance to the station, instead of dispersing, these privileged disturbers of the public peace formed in double file, and marched into the crowded street roaring out sacred words at the top of their voices, so that, as the tumult frightened not only the passengers on the pathway, but the horses in the road, we may conclude that they were solely intent upon "saving" themselves. That this is the fruit of the seed sown in England by Messrs. Moody and Sankey there can scarcely be a doubt; and it becomes a difficult matter, indeed, with those who do not believe that religion, in its purest sense, can be shown by blocking up the public streets and endangering the lives of passengers, to protect themselves effectually from such an intolerable nuisance. We might be content to remain perfectly passive in the matter, in the hope that such fanatical demonstrations would die out gradually; but, unfortunately, authentic information has arrived that Messrs. Moody and Sankey are again about to visit us, and may therefore conclude that these open-air exhibitions will increase rather than diminish. We will here not dwell upon the effect of such music to a certain extent barring the progress of works of a higher class amongst the multitude—true art may safely be left to take care of itself—but if those persons, who do not choose to go to the meetings of these musical evangelists, are to have the meetings come to them, and even jostle them into the road without the slightest apology, Moody and Sankeyism will in future have to be controlled by the police.

VERY much has been said respecting the desirability of reforming the class of entertainment placed before the audiences of "music-halls"; but some few recent experiences seem to point to the necessity of considering whether certain compositions to be found occasionally in the programmes of higher-class concerts are not calculated to lower the art and shock the feelings of musical listeners. Some time ago we drew attention to an advertisement in which a violin-player informed the public that he could teach persons, for a moderate "consideration," to imitate the cries of various animals by certain manipulations of his instrument known only to himself. The idea has evidently struck some aspiring singer that this could also be done by the voice; for in a critique upon a concert, lately forwarded to us, we read that one of the vocalists "sang 'Hurrah for the life of a Farmer,' and elicited shouts of laughter and applause by his wonderful imitation of the bipedal and quadrupedal occupants of a farm-yard. His imitation of a donkey seemed to come quite natural to him, and he had to bow his thanks for a recall." Now we have no doubt, from this notice, that the "shouts of laughter and applause" elicited by this gentleman were fairly earned; but must it not have been somewhat galling to the feelings of the young vocalists and instrumentalists who had preceded him when they found that the same demonstrations of delight which rewarded their efforts were—perhaps even more unanimously—bestowed upon the braying of a donkey? Assuredly it will be necessary, if such exhibitions are admitted into a concert-room, to submit a programme of the performances to artists before offering them engagements; for there are few persons of established reputation who would value the applause of an audience which had just been screaming with laughter at the imitation of a farm-yard.

THE artistic song-writers of the day—or, indeed, of any other day—whose music breathes the spirit of the words which inspire their genius are of course no more at a loss for materials to work with than is the painter or sculptor who draws his subjects from the life around him. But the musical workman who manufactures, or has manufactured for him, some verses to fit a few conventional phrases which have been sanctified by age, must be sadly perplexed for matter upon which to employ his skill. In proof of our assertion we find, by some recent advertisements, that this fact is not only frankly acknowledged, but actually turned to account; for in the announcement of a new song we are told that it is one of the "Mother" school: and in a catalogue now before us a vocal effusion is described as "one of the 'Meet me in the lane' kind of ballads." So far, then, from aiming at novelty, here is at once a method of making capital by working on the old lines, and song-makers cannot do better than carry out this idea as long as the public will bear it. Pathetic ballads of the "Tiny Grave" kind or of the "Broken vows" order might be multiplied with a certainty of success. A song of the "Briny deep" species or of the "Saucy eyes" kind would forcibly appeal to those whose sympathies are with these subjects, and the "royalty" system would sufficiently advertise them to the general public. It is true that in drawing-room vocal performances it might sometimes happen that one "order" of songs would prevail an entire evening; but this is a minor consideration. The great advantage of such classification would be that vocalists can know all about a composition before they purchase it; and as there would be probably no more variety in the music than in the words, in case of a song not being forthcoming, one of the same pattern would do quite as well.

THERE is yet hope for the English operatic composer, for a new lyrical work from the pen of one born in this country is about to be produced. Of course it may be readily imagined that such an announcement would be followed by an account of the formation of a company in the metropolis for the performance of operas by native composers; but unfortunately we have no such good news to record, for this practical proof of the appreciation of British art comes not from England, but from Germany. A letter, just received, informs us that "the first two performances of Mr. C. Villiers Stanford's Opera, 'The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan,' are announced to take place at the Hof Theater, Hanover, on the 6th and 11th inst. The tenor part will be sung by Herr Schott, whose fine performance of Lohengrin at Her Majesty's Theatre last winter will not be forgotten." Whilst confessing to a certain amount of sorrow that one of our countrymen should be compelled to seek a due recognition of his talent in Germany, we cannot but express a hope that the lesson may not be lost upon us; for although we may help not an artist to make his name, it is probable that we may cordially welcome him when he has made it, and even eventually be led to feel a certain sense of humiliation at our apathy. At all events the incident is of the utmost importance; and we have the satisfaction, therefore, of informing our readers that a detailed notice of the performance of the Opera will appear in our next number, from a special correspondent.

ACCORDING to a published statement, Music will have an International Exhibition all to itself next summer, the favoured scene of that unique event being Milan, where the show will remain open, in the Conservatorio, from May 1 till July 31, under the especial patronage of the Queen of Italy. The Committee, presided over by Count Borromeo, have determined upon five grand sections, which are, first, Composition in all its forms, classic and popular; second, Didactic Works, methods, treatises, instruction books, &c.; third, Musical Literature, including jurisprudence in relation to the theatre; fourth, Instruments, of all classes; fifth, Miscellaneous Collections relating to Music. It is further intended to organise a series of conferences, and of lectures with musical illustrations. The idea, unquestionably a good one, may, if carried out with proper spirit and liberality, have very happy results. At present, however, one obstacle of a serious nature stands in the road. The original notion was, it appears, to have only an Italian display; but now that a wider scope has been given to the enterprise, it is doubtful whether sufficient time remains for requisite preparation. All the same, much may be done in three months, having regard to the nature of the Exhibition, especially as Milan is not as far off as Melbourne or New York from the great centres of European musical life. Should the matter be taken up well, we may expect to see a representative gathering of professors and amateurs in the capital of Northern Italy next summer.

WE are glad to find that the rumour of a performance of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen" taking place in the metropolis during the forthcoming season has been confirmed beyond doubt; although we are not informed at what establishment the representations will take place. The most eminent German artists are announced to appear; and the work (directed by Herr Angelo Neumann, of the Leipzig Opera House) will be produced under the immediate supervision of the composer. We cordially wish this enterprise every success; but regret exceedingly that the chances of such a result should be imperilled by three "afternoon performances." Surely this matter is well worthy of reconsideration, since so many real music-lovers would be utterly unable in this commercial country to be present at any representation during the day.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE fourth Concert of the season took place on Thursday evening, the 20th ult. The programme, a most attractive one, consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." It is a matter for regret that the attendance was small, for the performance of works in such splendid contrast was most admirable. Yet it speaks highly for the popularity of the Society, that the audience was even so numerous as it was, for the extraordinarily severe weather which London has been subjected to, prevailed in all its intensity on the night in question, rendering locomotion to South Kensington a matter of discomfort and difficulty. It has almost become unnecessary to say that the chorus was thoroughly efficient, although, owing to the inclement weather, the number of chorists was not so great as usual, yet the attack and precision which generally characterise their efforts were as conspicuous as ever. None of the well-known points were missed, and in every respect the choral singing, especially in Mendelssohn's work, attained well nigh perfection. The soloists, Misses Annie Marriott, Thorndike, and Hope Glenn, Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Hilton, acquitted themselves admirably. Miss Marriott sustaining the arduous soprano parts with all requisite power of voice and musicianly skill, and Miss Glenn also earning good opinions, by reason of her pleasant and agreeable style. Mr. E. Lloyd once more demonstrated his thorough competence to undertake the most trying rôles, with delight to listeners and honour to himself. Mr. Barnby conducted with his accustomed skill and energy, and Dr. Stainer presided at the organ with his usual discretion.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THESE Concerts, as already announced, were resumed on the 10th ult., on which occasion Mdle. Marie Krebs appeared for the first time this season as the pianist, and was most warmly received upon her entrance, as well as in her performance of Beethoven's familiar "Waldstein" Sonata (Op. 53), the opening allegro of which she, however, played at too great a speed, at the cost of indistinct phrasing here and there. On the whole, however, her reading of the work was admirable, and was deservedly applauded by the audience, who would not be satisfied until the lady substituted another piece in response to an encore. The Concert opened with Mozart's String Quintet in G minor, No. 6, admirably played by Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Straus, Zerbini, and Piatti; and concluded with Beethoven's favourite Serenade Trio in D major (Op. 8), in the execution of which the lady violinist was associated with MM. Straus and Piatti. Miss Hope Glenn was the vocalist.

At the following Concert (the 17th ult.), Herr Jean Becker, after an absence of many years, reappeared as first violinist, and again proved himself equal to his great reputation as a consummate leader of the quartet party, which, in the present instance, consisted of himself, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti; the works chosen for the evening being Schumann's Quartet in A minor, No. 1, and Haydn's Quartet in D major (Op. 64), No. 1; both having been frequently heard before at these Concerts. Mdle. Krebs, who was again the pianist, gave an admirable and brilliant rendering of Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses (Op. 54); being likewise associated with Signor Piatti in the execution of Schumann's "Stücke in Volkston," for pianoforte and violoncello, the last of which was encored. Mdle.

Friedländer, who was the vocalist of the evening, contributed Mendelssohn's "Aerndtelied" and Bach's "Willst du dein Herz mir schenken," as well as songs by Grieg and Rubinstein.

The third Concert (the 24th ult.) included Schubert's Quartet in A minor (Op. 29) for strings, played in capital style by Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Straus, and Piatti; and Beethoven's Trio in G major (Op. 9), No. 1, in which the lady violinist was associated with MM. Straus and Piatti, and the performance of which was most enthusiastically received. Miss Dora Schirmacher, who was the pianist, met with well-deserved applause in her spirited interpretation of Beethoven's Variations in C minor; another instrumental solo being an exquisite rendering, on the part of Madame Norman-Néruda, of Handel's Violin Sonata in D major, accompanied on the pianoforte by M. Zerbini, who also officiated as Conductor. Mr. Frank Boyle was the vocalist, and was well received by the audience in his interpretation of songs by Handel, Mendelssohn, and Haydn. There was but a thin attendance, owing, no doubt, to the inclemency of the weather.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE second Concert of the season was given at the Shoreditch Town Hall on the 25th ult. The programme commenced with Hofmann's Cantata, "Melusina," being the first time of its performance, with orchestra, in London. The excessive melodiousness of the work, and its delicate and fanciful instrumentation, make it especially fitted for the choir and band under Mr. Prout's direction, and its rendering reflected the highest credit upon all concerned. Particularly must we mention the charming singing of Miss Annie Marriott in the principal part, the whole of the solos which fell to her share being given with true artistic feeling, eliciting the warmest expressions of approval from the audience. Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Thurley Beale, and Mr. Frederick Bevan were also most efficient, Mr. Beale giving, with good effect, the solo, "The Linden's whisper"; and the fine contralto voice of Miss McKenzie being heard to much advantage in the few solo parts allotted to her. The choruses were admirably sung, so well, indeed, as to render it impossible to select any for especial praise; and the band was thoroughly under the control of the Conductor throughout. The work made a deep impression upon the audience, and we trust that its production at this Concert will ensure for it a permanent place in the repertory of our Choral Societies. The second part comprised Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Gade's chorus, "Spring's Message"; Mr. Prout's MS. Minuet and Trio (repeated by desire); A. Goring Thomas's Scena, "Hero and Leander" (sung with much dramatic feeling by Miss Marriott); Dr. F. E. Gladstone's fine chorus, "A wet sheet and a flowing sea"; and Nicolai's Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor." Mr. Prout was, as usual, an able Conductor.

BERLIOZ'S "L'ENFANCE DU CHRIST."

"L'ENFANCE DU CHRIST," a sacred trilogy by Hector Berlioz, was given for the first time in this country at Mr. Hallé's Concert at Manchester, on December 30. That "The Childhood of Christ"—to use its English title—Op. 25, should have been composed by the author of the "Damnation of Faust," Op. 24, and that the former is in its way scarcely less remarkable than the latter, is one of the most astonishing proofs of versatility extant. Like all Berlioz's works it is essentially dramatic. The poem is from the composer's facile pen; and though it is difficult to judge of its literary merits through the medium of Mr. H. F. Chorley's translation, or rather imitation, the scenes represent a perfectly legitimate enlargement of the Bible narrative, and are excellently adapted to their purpose. The first part, which is entitled King Herod's Dream, opens with a recitative for the narrator (tenor), in which is mentioned the birth of Christ, and subsequent flight of parents and child to the wilderness. Then follows the "Night March"; scene—"a street in Jerusalem, Roman guards patrolling." On a pizzicato bass, ppp, a subject is enunciated on the first violins which is made the foundation of much clever, if not very pleasing, treatment. The second scene is in the palace of Herod (bass), who, in gloomy presentiment of his downfall, sings an air in G minor, the sombre tone of which is enhanced by the liberal employment of trombones pianissimo in the accompaniment. Like the former number it is clever and dramatic, but unattractive. In the third scene the magicians are summoned, to whom Herod relates his fears and his dream, and who undertake to "search and inquire" of "the powers of the air" for an interpretation. Then follows the "Incantation music;" "the magicians after performing their cabalistic evolutions begin the incantation." Here, as might be expected from the composer of the famous "Ride" in Faust, the peculiar genius of Berlioz, which enabled him to write so marvellously when depicting the demoniacal, has given a wonderful picture. The bars of this number are in triple and common time alternately, and in the score Berlioz has appended a note, of which the following is a translation: "The time in the bar of three beats is equal to that of the bar in four beats, and the union of the two bars ought to resemble a great bar of seven beats." A florid figure of two bars for the violas and cellos is reiterated with occasional variations and infinite variety of key throughout the movement, which is scored at the commencement for strings, clarinets, bassoons, and horns. The other instruments enter as the "incantation" proceeds, until the whole orchestra is employed to depict the frenzied endeavours of the magicians to compel an answer from the "powers of the air." The magicians are apparently successful in their incantation, for they proceed to enlighten Herod on the subject of his anxiety, and suggest the remedy known to history as the "massacre of the Innocents." This Herod agrees to in an impetuous air in F sharp minor, "Let the sword be bared for slaughter," the refrain of which is taken up by the magicians in chorus—a fitting sequel to the incantation. In the fifth scene we are transported to the "Stable at Bethlehem," where a duet of almost pastoral character is sung by Mary (soprano) and Joseph (baritone); the "Canon" form is resorted to with excellent effect towards the close of the duet, and the accompaniment is throughout scored with marvellous felicity. In the sixth scene we are again in the domain of spirits, but this time it is the unseen angels, who, solicitous as to the safety of Christ, direct an immediate flight. The directions in the score are—"Chorus of Angels behind the scene in a room near the orchestra, of which the door should be left open." A conversation is carried on between the Angels and the fugitives, principally in the recitative form; and the first part ends with a four-part chorus of idyllic beauty for soprani and contralti on the word "Hosanna," during which a foot-note directs that the door before mentioned should be closed.

The second part is entitled the "Flight into Egypt," and commences with an instrumental number representing the "shepherds assembling at the stable of Bethlehem." The movement is apparently in the key of F sharp minor, but in the initial phrase, which is a subject for imitation, the presence of an E natural imparts a curiously quaint character, and we are naturally reminded of some of the ancient ecclesiastical works in the Dorian or Hypo-dorian modes. The "Farewell of the Shepherds," which follows a chorus in 3-8 time in E major, is certainly the gem of the work, and for beautiful simplicity has seldom been surpassed. A remarkable modulation from C sharp minor into G major will probably save from the sacrilegious hands of the adapter a melody which would otherwise have certainly suffered mutilation for ecclesiastical purposes. Next we have an exquisitely beautiful movement in A minor, 6-8 time, representing the "Repose of the Holy Family," a morceau so true to its purpose that the narrator's words elucidatory of the situation seem unnecessary. Thoroughly devotional in style, marred by none of the eccentricity to which this composer was at times prone, these two numbers stand alone in idyllic beauty of melody, and elevation of sentiment. At the conclusion of the latter movement the "unseen Angels" are again heard in a pianissimo "Alleluia." The third part is entitled "The Coming to Saïs," and commences with an air for the narrator, founded on the same subject as the "Flight into Egypt," in which he describes the fatigues of the journey and the arrival at Saïs. In the first scene Mary, in an impassioned air, G minor, 3-8 time, incites Joseph to ask for shelter. To his most pathetic appeal, in D minor, a chorus of Romans, in B flat, 2-4 time, answer a contemptuous negative. Again Mary's lamentation, and Joseph's supplication, this time a semitone higher; and the Egyptians, in E flat, reply in the same words as the Romans. Earthly aid failing, Joseph seeks other guidance, and is led to a "dwelling with an earthen wall," where, in an impassioned duet with Mary, they again ask for shelter; and this time are welcomed by a new character, styled The Father of the Family (bass), and, in a short air of great beauty, bidden to enter. The Father of the Family then sings an air of welcome, "Fear not, though ye be half perished," in which appear two subjects used in the subsequent Chorus of Ismaelites, "Bring water for their feet," in which Berlioz has adopted his favourite device of using 6-4 and common time simultaneously. This chorus evinces his power of contrapuntal and imitative writing, and concludes with some harmonies of entrancing beauty. After this we have a symphony expressive of "the servants bringing wine and food with alacrity," which is followed by some recitatives in which it is agreed that the fugitives shall remain in their newly found home. A serenade, scored only for two flutes and a harp, is interesting, not only for its melodical and constructive excellence, but as a proof of Berlioz's power of expression with simple means. It is in three parts—Andante, D major, 9-8 time; Allegro vivo, in B minor, 2-4 time: and concludes with a repetition of the first subject. A trio, in which Mary and Joseph express their gratitude to The Father of the Family, who is still solicitous for their comfort, and a six-part chorus, "And now to slumber yield thee," in F major, 3-4 time, sung simultaneously with the trio, are admirable as specimens of part-writing, and in most perfect accord with the peaceful and devotional nature of the scene. The work concludes with an unaccompanied chorus, "O my spirit, do thou in faith and worship tender," which reminds us of the grand contrapuntal style of J. S. Bach, and is a curious contrast to the style of writing usually associated with Berlioz, but forms a fitting termination to a work which, as a combination of dramatic power and devotional beauty, has few compeers.

A notice of the performance will be found in the summary of country news.

TWO NEW OVERTURES BY JOHANNES BRAHMS.

AT the Gewandhaus Concert of the 12th ult., the chief feature of interest was the performance of two new concert overtures in MS., by Johannes Brahms. Although both works are written in strict classical overture form, their distinctive characteristics are in such marked contrast, that any monotony that might possibly be felt at their juxtaposition is entirely done away with. The first, in D minor, entitled "Tragische Overture," is full of passionate dramatic expression, and justifies its name by presenting to the mind, even of the most casual hearer, the clear idea of two contending forces—the human or pathetic, struggling against, and finally subdued by, an overpowering and irresistible fate. The first of these two tragic elements, whose contest forms the groundwork of the overture, is represented by the wood wind, in which the oboe takes a prominent part, accompanied by the strings, somewhat analogous to the effect at the opening of Schubert's unfinished symphony; the second by the brass instruments. The use of the trombones and tuba throughout is strikingly original, the latter instrument taking what might almost be described as an obbligato part. After the opening bars, the brass is entirely silent for some time, during which the wood and the strings seem to recover hope and courage, and even to be on the point of gaining the victory, when the brass enters again with a derisive cry, and, after a brief conflict, bears all before it with resistless force. Before and after this dramatic part of the overture, there are short passages for the whole orchestra, of an impassioned and emotional character, fitly introducing and concluding this central portion of the work.

The second, or "Akademische Fest Overture," in C minor, is, as its name implies, founded on students' songs, and might almost be called a fantasia, were it not in strict sonata-form throughout. It is not so much remarkable for any emotional character, as for its extraordinarily original instrumentation. From the pianissimo cymbals in the opening bars, leading into a solemn and devotional strain, given out by the brass with striking effect, to the genuine and irresistible fun of the last student song, which enters on the bassoons, and is then taken up by the rest of the wood band, the treatment of the orchestra is entirely new, and unlike any previous work of the composer. Another remarkable point occurs about the middle of the overture, where the closed notes of the horns are introduced alone with a strange and weird effect; and at the end of the whole the triangle appears upon the scene as a pendant to the treatment of the cymbals at the opening. The imaginative hearer may picture to himself the clinking of glasses at some student festivity, but it is right to add that so-called "programme-music" forms no part of the work.

Both the overtures, but more especially the second, are clear in form, easy to follow, and enjoyable even at a first hearing; in this they resemble the other works of the master's later style, such as the Violin Sonata, or the Rhapsodies for pianoforte solo.

The Akademische Fest Overture was written in recognition of the degree conferred upon the composer by the University of Breslau, and was first performed in that town privately on the 4th ult. A few days later both the overtures were played at a Philharmonic Concert in Vienna, where they were very coldly received. Their reception at the Gewandhaus was scarcely more enthusiastic, but taking into consideration the strict conservatism of this audience it is scarcely to be wondered at. It is, however, surprising that the first overture should have been accused of being incomprehensible, and the second of being vulgar; yet such was the opinion of the hereditary stall-holder in the Gewandhaus, whose musical prejudices are as great as his critical capabilities are small. Far different was the warm reception accorded to the works at the rehearsal, when the seats were open to all comers, and an audience of genuine lovers of music was assembled.

The remainder of the programme at this Concert was also interesting; it included that masterpiece of exquisite workmanship, Mozart's Symphony in E flat, perfectly interpreted by the orchestra, and besides two vocal pieces, a pianoforte concerto by the conductor, Carl Reinecke, a well manufactured composition, with which it is difficult to find fault. The overtures were conducted by Brahms in person, whose capabilities as leader of an orchestra would probably be more renowned than they are, if his powers as a composer did not outweigh them.

No public, perhaps, is more overrated by the outer world than that of the Gewandhaus. In order to secure a seat, which may in twenty years become vacant, the names of children of two years old are often put down on the list of candidates (it is needless to say without reference to their musical capabilities, dormant or otherwise), and the result naturally is an audience, one out of thirty of which is, perhaps, musical, and the rest entirely the reverse. The latter, however, unfortunately do not feel called upon to keep discreet silence, but express opinions which only too often expose their inherent ignorance. No better instance of this can be found than the reception at the Gewandhaus of Brahms's Serenade for small orchestra in A, when first performed there. The writer had the advantage of being present on that occasion, very shortly after hearing it at its first performance by the Philharmonic Society of London. At the latter performance he recalls with pleasure mixed with satisfaction that no fewer than two movements were enthusiastically enjoyed, and the remainder as warmly applauded; at the former it can be said with literal truth that not a single hand was raised to applaud from beginning to end. After this instance it will be needless to enlarge further upon the taste of the Gewandhaus public. In fairness, however, it must be added that in no respect can it be called the Leipzig public, which is both discriminating and sympathetic. At present, however, the only musical performances to which they can obtain admittance are those of the theatre; but the building, which is now progressing, of a larger room for the Gewandhaus Concerts, will, we trust, go far to provide a public which can appreciate the real excellence of these now historical musical performances.

CONFERENCE ON ORGAN CONSTRUCTION.

THE attention of the College of Organists has for some time past been directed to the consideration of the importance of securing uniformity in the arrangement of those parts of organs with which the performer is most directly concerned; as, the relative position of manual and pedal keyboards; the position of drawstops; the order of composition pedals, &c. At present when an organist sits down to a strange organ, he may find not only that the pedals are of a wider or narrower scale than those to which he is accustomed, but possibly they will be in altogether a different place from left to right; in one case the central note of the pedal-board is placed under the central note of the manual compass, in another a certain note of the pedal (middle C, C \sharp , or D) is placed under some particular note of the manual, and in a third case some purely arbitrary arrangement prevails. Not less uncertainty exists as to the perpendicular distance between manuals and pedals, and it is impossible for the most experienced organist to predicate with any certainty where he will find the drawstops that control the contents of the several departments of great, choir, and swell in an organ with which he is unacquainted. It is evidently of the greatest importance to organists that their instruments should be arranged on some uniform plan, and they are wise in consulting with one another, and in calling in the aid of the leading organ-builders, to discuss a subject of such consequence. If it is too much to hope that absolute uniformity will be at once attained, a great step will be gained when certain standard arrangements of parts are accepted as correct, and deviation from such standard in any particular organ regarded as so many defects: when, in short, there is a recognised right and wrong in the matter.

As a preliminary to the conference, the Council of the College of Organists circulated among their fellows and members a series of questions relating to the points indicated above. The replies, giving particulars of a large number of the most important organs in the kingdom, furnished abundant evidence of the diversity which at present obtains. The conference extended over three days, commencing with a preliminary meeting on Monday, the 3rd ult. This meeting was opened by Mr. E. H. Turpin, the hon. sec. of the College, reading a digest of the replies mentioned above; and afterwards the order in which the several subjects should be submitted at the principal meeting of the conference was arranged, and many valuable suggestions were considered. On Tuesday, the 4th ult., the chief meeting commenced (which was continued by adjournment on the next day, Wednesday), Dr. Arnold, of Winchester, being called to the chair. A series of resolutions were tentatively passed. It was generally felt that radiating pedals radiated too much, and became inconvenient owing to the constant variation in the width of the scale from one note to another at different parts of the pedal-board, and also that the heel, the widest, and least elastic part of the foot, has to perform at the most cramped and confined part of the pedal-board. The general preference of the conference was in favour of parallel or slightly radiating pedals, combined with slight concavity. The position of middle C of the pedal-board under middle C of the manuals, was that which found most favour with the meeting. [This is the position long ago advocated by Mr. Hopkins in his valuable work on the Organ.] The scale of pedals was somewhat debated. The width of $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches from the centre of one natural to the centre of the next, seemed to command most assent, but the final decision was deferred, as it was resolved to invite the loan of pedals of various forms and scales; these are to be exhibited under a three manual keyboard arranged on a frame constructed to allow variation in height and position. Attention was called to the inconvenience that arises when it is necessary to play a succession of three short pedal-keys as F \sharp , G \sharp , A \sharp , owing to the impossibility of either passing or changing the feet on the short keys. Several suggestions were made to overcome the difficulty and the matter was referred to Messrs. E. H. Turpin and J. Higgs, who were appointed a sub-committee to plan a form of pedal sharp in accordance with the suggestions made. The importance of a more gradual crescendo than that afforded by many swell pedals was mentioned, and fault was found with the too sudden burst of power which in many cases attends the first half-inch of movement of the swell pedal. The desirability of the crescendo being equally distributed over the whole descent of the pedal, and the power of fixing the pedal at any point in its career, were unanimously agreed to.

The meeting was adjourned to the 3rd inst., when models and drawings will be exhibited at Neumeyer Hall, Bloomsbury, and the discussion resumed. Nearly all the leading organists and the principal organ builders in town and country have expressed approval of the objects of this conference either by personal participation in the meetings or by letter, and we cordially wish it success.

It is not at all surprising to find that Mr. Hullah's "Report on Musical Instruction in Elementary Schools on the Continent" attracted the serious attention of his old antagonists, the leaders of Tonic Sol-fa. We dealt with the Report at the time of its appearance, and our readers may remember that it expressed the highest approval of musical teaching as carried on in the schools of Belgium and Holland. Mr. Hullah said: "The schools of Holland and Belgium more especially present instances without number of children of the humblest class, of the ages of seven, nine, and ten, who can not only sing what they have learnt with taste and refinement, but sing at sight passages of considerable difficulty with as much ease and evident intelligence as they would show in reading literary passages within the range of their comprehension." Now, inasmuch as the ordinary notation is used to produce these surprising results, and Mr. Hullah is the official musical adviser of the Committee of Council, the Tonic Sol-faists naturally felt anxious as to the possible effect of such a statement. Mr. Hullah's discovery was equivalent to a serious attack upon the raison d'être of their system, and in order to test the value of his evidence a well-known leader of Tonic Sol-fa, Mr. McNaught, started to go over the same ground. Mr. McNaught has since issued a statement of his experiences, and the curious in such matters may bind it up with Mr. Hullah's as showing to what extent the appearance of objects depends upon the glass through which they are viewed. The Tonic Sol-fa investigator went first to Holland. There he ascertained that music-teaching in primary schools is only four or five years old; and that teachers are quite free to choose their own method. This could hardly have been the beginning expected, and Mr. McNaught may have put away sanguine anticipations about the rest. In the school of a teacher highly reputed at the Hague, the advanced pupils abandoned "after many mistakes" a very simple test in sight-singing. In Amsterdam both the teacher and pupils, at a school where singing is very well taught, declined to attempt the sight-reading of a purely diatonic melody. In Rotterdam, the test applied resulted in that which, says Mr. McNaught, could "scarcely be called sight-singing," and at another school, where the children were led by the master, very small difficulties ended in "general failure." At the Rotterdam Training College, scarcely better results were elicited; a selected student in his third year actually "flinching" at the interval D (fourth line), F sharp below, in the key of E flat. The report upon the Belgian schools is more favourable, especially with regard to the teaching by M. Landa of a method (Dessrier's) which Mr. McNaught explains at some length. Indeed, the English visitor had no difficulty in believing that the reading at sight of the children in the Brussels Communal Schools was "very good." Mr. McNaught sums up with an opinion that Dutch school singing is in no better than an experimental stage; while the good results seen in Belgium are due to "great expenditure of time, special teaching power, and considerable cost." We commend the pamphlet, which is full of interesting matter, to all who are concerned about its important subject.

MR. JAMES SHAW'S Concert took place in the Vestry Hall, Haverstock Hill, on Monday, the 10th ult., and proved in every respect very successful. The bénéficiaire is Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church of Hampstead, and has raised the musical portion of the services to a high standard of proficiency. The programme commenced with Mendelssohn's Motett "Hear my prayer," the solo being admirably sung by Miss Anna Williams, the choir consisting of forty selected voices. The other soloists were Miss Cathcart, Miss Hughes, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The first-named gentleman was highly effective in Blumenthal's "Requital" and Beethoven's "Adelaide." Miss Anna Williams was again heard to great advantage in Weber's scena "Softly sighs," and in F. Clay's "She wandered down the mountain's side," and as an encore for the latter substituted Marzials' ballad "Tis nothing but a shower." Mr. Beale gave a spirited rendering of "O ruddier than the cherry," and introduced an excellent new song written for him by Mr. Shaw, "A wet sheet and a flowing sea." Miss Cathcart also sang a new and melodious song by the same composer entitled "Constancy." The principal novelty of the Concert was, however, "A Thanksgiving Ode" ("Non nobis Domine"), originally composed for a "house-warming," or inaugural domestic festival, by Mr. Shaw, consisting of an overture, solo voices, and chorus. The work was very efficiently rendered, and deserves to be heard again. Herr Otto Booth and Mr. Boatwright, with Mr. Shaw at the pianoforte, played Beethoven's Trio in C minor, and Mr. Shaw also played some of Schumann's Novellen and Heller's "La Truite" with much taste and expression. Mr. W. S. Hoyte was the accompanist.

At the last Christmas examinations in the University of London, two candidates, Mr. H. Keatley Moore, of Croydon, and Mr. W. H. Hunt, of Birkenhead, were passed by the Examiners (Dr. Stainer and Dr. Pole) as qualified to receive the Mus. Bac. degree. These are the first musical degrees given at this University. The examination is divided into two parts, with a year's interval between them. The first is theoretical, comprising the physical nature of musical sounds, and the general principles of music; the second is practical, referring to harmony, counterpoint in five parts, form, instrumentation, knowledge of standard works, &c.; and it also includes the composition of an approved exercise. It is somewhat remarkable that although in 1878 and 1879 twelve candidates creditably answered the theoretical test, only the two above mentioned have succeeded in passing the practical one. We understand that the Examiners are determined to keep up the standard of practical musician-like attainments at a level fully as high as that demanded in the other great Universities of the kingdom, so that the musical value of the degree may be fully maintained. The following candidates passed the First B. Mus Examination (First Division): John Hatchwell, private study; Augustus Hayter Walker, private study. (Second Division): Joseph Rosamond Adie, University College.

MR. CARRODUS'S Violin Recital, which took place at St. James's Hall on the 20th ult., has set an example which we hope will be extensively followed. Conscious of his own powers, the concert-giver resolved to prove that a violinist can hold the interest of an audience for an evening's performance as effectually as can a pianist, and the result has fully shown the soundness of his judgment. In his performance of Ernst's Fantasia on themes from "Il Pirata," four pieces by Molique, the Adagio from Spohr's Ninth Concerto, Bach's Chaconne in D minor, and compositions by Vieuxtemps, Paganini, Wieniawski, Tours, and also a Scotch Fantasia of his own, Mr. Carrodus displayed a finished execution and a deep sympathy with the varied styles of the writers he had chosen which elicited the most genuine marks of enthusiasm. His rendering of Bach's Chaconne was amongst the finest specimens of pure violin-playing ever heard; and we must also mention that an "Allegretto Grazioso" in F, by Molique, and a Romance and Tarantella by Tours, were most enthusiastically redemanded. The accompanists were Mr. Frank Amor and Master John Carrodus, both of whom discharged their duties most efficiently, the young artist last named giving much promise of future excellence.

THE Highgate Choral Society gave its first Concert at the Northfield Hall, Highgate, on December 30. The programme consisted of Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," and a miscellaneous second part. The performance of the Cantata was in many respects praiseworthy, the choir, some fifty-five voices, being tolerably satisfactory, although there can be no doubt that one or two extra rehearsals would have materially enhanced the effect. The band, which occasionally seemed somewhat disorganised, strove to do justice to the charming instrumentation that abounds in the "Daughter of Jairus." The uncertainty, however, now and then felt throughout the evening, was chiefly owing to the brass, at all times an element of danger. The soloists, Miss Catherine Penna, Messrs. Buckland and Kempton rendered valuable aid in the Cantata, and in the second part, added no little to the interest of the Concert by contributing several miscellaneous songs. Miss Penna was especially successful, being called upon to repeat "Bid me discourse"; a like honour was also paid to the choir for their correct and finished singing of "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower." Mr. Thos. W. Staniforth conducted.

THE Crouch End Choral Society gave its first Concert of the present season at Christ Church School-room, Crouch End, on Tuesday the 4th ult., before a large audience. The first part of the programme was devoted to sacred music, the most important of which was Mendelssohn's "Festgesang" (originally written for male voices and military band), given by the chorus, with orchestral accompaniments adapted by the Conductor. The second part comprised, amongst other items, Beethoven's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Auber's overture "La Sirène," Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor (excellently played by Miss Rhodes), and a new song, "The King of the Night," by A. J. Dye, well sung by Mr. Prenton. The other vocalists were Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Coyte Turner, and Mr. C. A. White, who were all well received. Mr. S. Dean Grimson led the band, Mrs. Alfred Dye presided at the piano, and Mr. Alfred J. Dye conducted. J. F. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" and J. G. Callcott's "Golden Harvest" are announced for the next Concert.

ON Monday evening the 7th ult. the Victoria Choral Society, St. John's Wood, gave its first Concert for the present season. The first part of the programme included Spohr's Cantata "God, Thou art great," Miss Porter taking the soprano music, which she rendered with much feeling; Miss Fanny Gullick achieving a marked success with Mr. Joyce in the duet "Children, pray this love to cherish." Mr. J. T. Lightwood, Mus. Bac., played very effectively two pianoforte pieces by Mendelssohn. The second part included Mendelssohn's Motett "Hear my prayer," Miss Burrowes singing the soprano part with much success. Mr. Walter Jones sang with good effect selections from the "Messiah"; Mr. G. S. Downie was also well received. Mr. Meadmore and Miss Alice Cooper played a duet for flute and pianoforte, which gained much applause. Miss Ada Barnett and Miss Frances Cooper accompanied, and Mr. E. Jenn conducted.

AN Organ Recital was given by Mr. Alfred A. Physick on Tuesday, the 4th ult., on the large organ in Lancaster Hall, Notting Hill. The programme was well selected, and included, amongst other compositions, the Overture to Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus"; Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor; Handel's Gavotte in B♭; Mendelssohn's Sixth Organ Sonata (D minor); Introduction and Fugue from Dr. Sloman's "Supplication and Praise," a Piano and Organ Duet; Guilman's Scherzo Capriccioso, Op. 36; and a Festal March composed by the performer. The duet for piano and organ was encored ("The March of the silver trumpets," duet, being given in response), and Mr. Physick's Festal March was received with special favour. Some vocal music was also successfully contributed by Mr. W. Gregory. Mrs. Gregory presided at the pianoforte.

THE annual performance of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" in Westminster Abbey took place on the 19th ult. Notwithstanding the severity of the weather the nave was crowded. The solos were admirably given by Messrs. Kearton and Hilton, Masters Ould, Bowes, and Hodsdon, all of the Abbey choir. Mr. Hilton's solo, "Mighty Lord" (trumpet obbligato, Mr. Harper), and the beautiful "Slumber, my beloved" by Master Bowes (who possesses a contralto voice of remarkable quality), were among the best numbers. Mr. Kearton sang the difficult recitatives in excellent taste, and his solo, "Haste, ye shepherds," with the charming flute accompaniment, was, as usual, a great treat. The band and chorus numbered about 150, and included the boys of the Chapel Royal, St. Paul's Cathedral, and St. Peter's, Eaton Square. Dr. Stainer was at the organ, and Dr. Bridge conducted.

THE following graceful tribute to the retiring organist of Norwich Cathedral, Dr. Gladstone, is extracted from the Eastern Daily Press:—

We are sorry to announce that Dr. F. E. Gladstone has felt himself compelled to resign the position of organist of Norwich Cathedral. Our regret, which under any circumstances would be great at the loss of a gentleman of so much talent and such varied acquirements, is increased by the knowledge that this step has been rendered inevitable by the delicate health of his children, whose ailments have been aggravated by the east winds so prevalent in this locality. Dr. Gladstone has, therefore, been induced to accept the post of organist and choir-master of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, London, and also the Professorship of Counterpoint, Canon, and Fugue at Trinity College, London. As our readers are aware, he came to this city under peculiar circumstances, but we are happy to know that he has lived through their most disagreeable phase, and that his departure from amongst us will be attended with universal regret and at the same time with the best wishes for his success in his new field of labour.

THE newly completed organ at St. Faith's Church, Stoke Newington, used for the first time on Christmas Day, was formally opened on Thursday evening, December 30. The instrument is built by Messrs. Hill and Son, and has two manuals, nineteen stops, three couplers, and five composition pedals. Mr. Thomas Morley, of Harmondsworth, Slough, and late of St. Alban's Holborn, played in excellent style a selection of music, including Handel's "Occasional" Overture, the Pastorale from Corelli's Eighth Concerto, and two Offer-toires of Lott and Chinner. Mr. Henry Knott, organist of St. Faith's, performed Lefébure-Wely's Offertoire in G, and Mendelssohn's War March, and accompanied the choir of the church in several solo and chorus anthems.

MISS JOSEPHINE AGABEG gave an evening Concert at Steinway Hall on the 17th ult., before an appreciative audience. Madame Edith Wynne was unfortunately prevented by indisposition from singing, but the vocalists who took part in the programme—Miss Cecilia Fuller, Miss Marian Williams, Mr. James Sauvage, and Mr. Frank Quatremayne—were highly successful. The concert-giver's pianoforte-playing was of course a marked feature in the selection, her rendering of Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata" especially being warmly and deservedly applauded. Miss Agabeg was assisted in the instrumental department by Mdlle. Bertha Brousil (violin), Mr. Wilhelm Ganz (pianoforte), and M. Gustav Libotton (violoncello).

OF the candidates at the recent Christmas Examination of the College of Organists the following obtained Fellowship: Messrs. W. G. Alcock, W. H. Barrow, James Bryant, Harry Dancy, A. J. Greenish, A. Gore Mitchell, Mus. Bac., and C. J. Pearce, Mus. Bac. To the following Associateship was awarded: Thomas Adams and J. Dalby. The number of candidates presenting themselves for examination exceeded the total of any similar occasion. The Examiners were the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., Mus. Doc., M.A.; G. B. Arnold, Mus. Doc.; F. E. Gladstone, Mus. Doc.; Henry Gadsby, E. J. Hopkins, and E. H. Turpin.

THE Daily Telegraph of the 26th ult. states that "a great Musical Festival is being organised at Brighton, to take place on September 6 and 7. Many French choral societies have already promised to attend, and four or five thousand musicians are expected to be present. Amongst those gentlemen who have allowed their names to be used in connection with the festival are: MM. C. Gounod and Challemeil-Lacour, the Mayors of Brussels and Brighton, Mr. Holland, M.P., Mr. Marriott, M.P., Dr. Macfarren, Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. Kuhe, Mr. Arthur Sullivan, and Mr. Ganz. The secretary to the committee of organisation is Mr. C. de la Grave."

WE have received a copy of the correspondence between Mr. Edward Clarke, Q.C., M.P. for Plymouth, and Mr. Frederick Clark, secretary and solicitor to Trinity College, London, which has just been printed by order of the Council. It appears that Mr. Clarke has brought certain accusations against the executive of the College, and the Council has replied to them; but as we have no desire to range ourselves on either side in the controversy, we refer such of our readers as are interested in the matter to the pamphlet itself, which, we presume, is procurable by the general public.

A FESTIVAL Service will be held at St. Matthias' Church, Earl's Court, Kensington, on St. Matthias' Day, the 24th inst., at 8 o'clock in the evening. Spohr's Cantata "God, Thou art great" will be performed with full orchestra; also Gadsby's Evening Service in C. On March 11, at a solemn sacred service, a new Sacred Cantata by J. H. Bonawitz will be performed for the first time, with a full orchestra and chorus, conducted by the composer—the violin obbligato being played by Herr Joachim.

THE Annual General Meeting of the Choir Benevolent Fund was held on the 25th ult. at the Choir School House, St. Paul's, by the courtesy of the Rev. A. Barff. The balance-sheet (which was very satisfactory) and the report for last year were passed for printing. There was a larger attendance of members than usual, and several changes were made in the executive. We regret to learn that the names of Sir Geo. Elvey and of other influential members are not retained on the Committee.

AN Association for the practice of choral music, called the St. George the Martyr Choral Society, has been successfully started in Bloomsbury, the conductor being Mr. A. W. Constantine, for many years the organist of the church. Although the Society was only formed in December last, the names of fifty members are already enrolled, and Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" has been placed in rehearsal.

AT St. Michael and All Angels, Chiswick, a selection from the first part of the "Messiah" was sung after Evenson on Christmas Eve. The solos were effectively rendered by Messrs. Crimp, Gilbert, and Thompson, and the choruses were given remarkably well. Mr. J. W. Walker presided at the organ, and Mr. Alfred Thompson conducted.

A MUSICAL Entertainment, kindly provided by Mr. Walter Clifford, and supported by Madame Edith Touzeau, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, Signor Nicola Ferri, and Mr. W. H. Romaine-Walker, was given to the patients of Brompton Hospital on the 18th ult. The various items were received with the warmest marks of approval. Signor Ferri acted as accompanist throughout the evening.

MR. RICHARD LEMAIRE secured the services of Mr. Charles Hallé for a Pianoforte Recital at the Erith Public Hall, on the 10th ult. The programme included the Waldstein Sonata (Beethoven), Nocturne in F sharp, and Grand Polonaise in A flat (Chopin), Impromptu (Schubert), and Rondo in C (Weber). Mr. Kenningham was the vocalist.

MR. SULLIVAN'S "Martyr of Antioch" will be given at St. James's Hall on March 18, under the conductorship of the composer. The choruses will be sung by Mr. Faulkner Leigh's choir, and the principal vocalists will be those who took part in the original performance of the work at the Leeds Festival.

A MARBLE tablet has recently been erected in Plaistow Congregational Church, in memory of the late Rev. John Curwen. The memorial is of a scroll design, executed in white Carrara and black marbles, by Messrs. Gaffin and Co., of Regent Street, London.

THE Services at St. Alban's, Holborn, on Christmas Eve and Christmas Day comprised Gounod's "Nazareth" (sung by Mr. Alfred Moore), Adolphe Adam's "Noël" (sung by Mr. Knott), Gounod's "Bethlehem," Mozart's Ave Verum, and Credo and Gloria from Mozart's First Mass.

THE magnificent organ at All Saints', Margaret Street, is undergoing reconstruction by Messrs. T. C. Lewis and Co., Brixton, at a cost of £750. It is expected that it will be completed by Easter Day.

WE understand that it is intended, if a sufficient number of subscribers be obtained, to give a fourth series of the high-class performances of chamber-music, the "Denmark Hill Concerts," at the South London Institute of Music, Camberwell. Mr. S. Arthur Chappell will, it is said, again have the management.

THE Annual Festival Service of the Association of Lay Helpers for the diocese of London takes place at St. Paul's Cathedral on the last evening of the present month, Monday, the 28th inst., on which occasion a new Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, composed specially for the Association by Mr. C. E. Miller, will be sung for the first time.

AN Organ Recital was given on the 13th ult. at Camberwell Green Congregational Church, by Mr. George Shinn, Mus. Bac., Cantab., on the organ recently built by Foster and Andrews. Miss Webber, Miss Davey, and Mr. Albert James were the vocalists.

MR. C. H. H. PARRY'S setting of Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound," written for the Gloucester Festival of 1880, will be performed at Cambridge by the University Musical Society under the direction of Mr. C. Villiers Stanford in May next.

IN consequence of the exceptional severity of the weather, the Sacred Harmonic Society postponed to a future date the Concert which was announced for the 21st ult. At the next Concert (11th inst.) the Society will perform Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch."

FEBRUARY being a short month, we shall be compelled to print the March number earlier than usual. All matter and advertisements intended for insertion in this number should, therefore, reach the Office on or before the 22nd inst.

REVIEWS.

The Wishing Stone. A Cantata for Female Voices. Words by Edward Oxenford. Music composed by Franz Abt. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this Cantata seems to have an especial talent for writing vocal works exclusively for female voices; and we can say, from our own experience, that his Cantatas have already effected much good in schools where, but for the existence of such works, the trashiest ballads might have reigned supreme. The legend upon which the work before us is based is thus described: "There exists in a remote part of the Pyrenees a detached mass of rock which is popularly known as the Wishing Stone. According to tradition, this rock is the abode of a good Fairy, who invariably grants the wishes of those who repair to the spot in question, provided the visit be paid at the midnight following Midsummer Day. Firm believers in this tradition, the peasantry flock to the Wishing Stone at the appointed hour, and the journey to and from is enlivened with music and songs." Mr. Oxenford has written a pleasing and fanciful libretto upon this slender little story, one of the great merits of which is that it is excellently laid out for a musical setting. The fault of many Cantatas of this kind is that the composer, in the attempt to be simple, becomes trivial, and the hearers are wearied with the constant repetitions of subjects which have not sufficient interest to ensure a welcome on their reappearance. "The Wishing Stone," however, is a remarkable exception to this rule; for not only is it the most melodious of all the Cantatas we have seen from the pen of this prolific writer, but undue repetitions of the themes are so carefully avoided that the ear is never distressed. A graceful little Introduction for the pianoforte ushers in the opening chorus, which commences with a flowing subject in 9-8 rhythm, and changes most effectively to C, the movement dying off with a Coda, to which some graceful pianoforte passages add an especial charm. The following soprano solo, after a short recitative, is a fresh little melody in waltz rhythm, containing some changes of key, which keep the attention alive, and give much effect to the return of the theme. The duet for mezzo-soprano and contralto, "The Silvery Moon," is a tranquil and simple piece of two-part writing, somewhat conventional, perhaps, in character, but easy to sing and extremely melodious. The Choral Recitative, followed by a chorus, "Hand in hand we hasten," call for no special remark; but the ballad, for soprano, "Sweet Fairy, who for countless years," will no doubt be a favourite, both for its tunefulness and sympathetic expression of the words. The Finale—a trio and chorus, preceded by a brief Recitative—commencing in G major, has an effective solo in B \flat for contralto (a voice, by the way, somewhat unduly neglected in the work); and the choral portion, whilst appropriate to the subject, offers no difficulties to amateur executants. We have little doubt that this Cantata will speedily make its way to the popularity it deserves.

The Great Musicians. No. I., "Wagner," by Francis Hueffer. No. II., "Rossini and his School," by H. Sutherland Edwards.

[London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington.]

THESE two little volumes mark the commencement of a series of biographical sketches written by various hands, under the editorship of Dr. Francis Hueffer; the apparent object being to do for "Great Musicians" what has been done for "Great Artists" in the publishers' series devoted to painters. It would hardly be fair to expect important contributions to biography in works of such limited scope; and it happens, with regard to the volumes before us, that each is the production of an author who has covered the same ground before. Dr. Hueffer, we need scarcely say, has been a large contributor to the English department of Wagnerian literature, while Mr. Sutherland Edwards produced a "Life of Rossini" shortly after that composer's death. The interest of the present works has, therefore, been anticipated, and students of musical bibliography are able to make a shrewd guess, not only at the facts but at the opinions they contain. It is, however, an advantage to the general reader to have the material connected with each subject put before him in a limited compass and succinct manner. Dr. Hueffer, who, as may be supposed, treats his theme sympathetically, touches with great lightness upon the circumstances of Wagner's life, the book being, to a large extent, taken up with an exposition of the master's theory and descriptions of his various operas. Whether due proportion has been observed between the man and his work is a question upon which opinions may differ. On his part Mr. Edwards traces with some minuteness of detail the incidents of Rossini's long career, going on to sketch the achievements, in what he styles Rossini's "school," of Donizetti, Bellini, and Verdi. The multiplication of such elementary books as these is much to be desired, and may be regarded as a good sign, since those who are interested in a man's music are always eager to know the man himself, and whoever comes to read of the man may possibly feel the promptings of curiosity about his music.

Narcissus and Echo. A Dramatic Cantata. The words written by Miriam Ross. The music composed by Edwin C. Such, Mus. Bac., Cantab. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE fanciful classical legend—too well known to be here repeated—concerning Narcissus and the Nymph Echo has been effectively woven into a libretto for musical purposes; and although Mr. Such's setting of the words fails to display that individuality of style which would lift his Cantata far above the level of the many similar works of the day, it is melodious, refined, and thoroughly vocal throughout. There is character in the solo and chorus "In a ring"; the Trio, "Ah, woe is me," shows much skill and dramatic feeling; and the Chorus of Bacchanals, with snatches of solo for Echo, is unquestionably the best piece in the work; an excellent effect is gained by the repetitions of phrases; and the exclamations of the Bacchanals, "Hark! she mocks us," and "While weeping she repeats our strains," give a dramatic colouring to the piece which seems to suggest the accessories of the stage: indeed as a drawing-room Cantata, even, it is worth attempting, with the aid of scenery and dresses. We may also select for praise the "Elegy," for a bass voice, where Echo again repeats the notes she hears; and the final chorus, "The day is dying"—(in which, by the way, we cannot see why the basses at page 89 are made to rise to A flat, instead of G sharp)—concludes the Cantata with good effect. Choral Societies will, we think, be pleased to hear of a composition so well suited for performance with merely a pianoforte accompaniment; and we shall be glad if we can help it into public notice.

Studies in Worship-Music; chiefly as regards Congregational Singing. By J. Spencer Curwen.

[J. Curwen and Sons.]

THE author of this useful and thoughtful work tells us that portions of it are reprinted, with additions and modifications, from various Reviews, Magazines, and Newspapers; but the subjects are so logically and carefully arranged that this will be found no objection by the general reader. The book is divided into three parts—Historical, Practical, and Descriptive. In the first part much valuable information is collected on the "Old Parochial Psalmody"; and an interesting extract from Strype's Annals gives authentic evidence of the gradual awakening of the English Church on the return to this country of those zealous reformers who had been driven away by the persecution of Mary. "Grindal, the new Bishop of London," he tells us, "preached at Paul's Cross, and after sermon a psalm was sung (which was the common practice of the Reformed churches abroad), wherein the people also joined their voices. As soon as they commenced singing in London, immediately not only the churches in the neighbourhood, but even the towns far distant began to vie with each other in the practice. You may now sometimes see at Paul's Cross, after the service, six thousand persons, young and old, of all sexes, singing together; this sadly annoys the mass priests, for they perceive that by this means the sacred discourse sinks more deeply into the minds of men." When the version of the Psalms known as "Sternhold and Hopkins" was duly authorised, in 1562, our author truly says that "Psalm-singer" was indeed but another name for a Protestant. We regret that we cannot quote more extensively from this portion of Mr. Curwen's book; but cordially recommend those interested in the subject to peruse this record of many facts connected with the early history of Psalmody in England, which cannot be too extensively known to lovers of congregational singing. In Part II. we have some very sensible and acute remarks upon the use of the organ in divine service. "It is far easier," says Mr. Curwen, "to make an organ than an organist"; and although assuredly the former task is a somewhat difficult one, we are almost inclined to agree with him. The qualifications necessary for a really good organist are more than is generally imagined; for to play through a service in the usual conventional style, and to infuse a really religious spirit into both the singing and the congregation, are two distinct things. What, for example, will apathetic organists say when they hear how much sympathy with the music must be felt even by a person who aspires to turn a barrel-organ? Speaking of one of these instruments actually now in use at the old Parish Church of East Ham, Essex, Mr. Curwen says: "I recently persuaded the old man who has turned the organ for forty years to give me a recital. It was of no use, he assured me, for any one to play that organ who had no ear for music. He explained how, at the reciting-notes of the chants, he had to pause in his turning; how he gave a rallentando at the end of the hymn; and how he piled on the stops at the successive lines of a repeating tune." Here then is a man who, instead of degrading his art into a mechanical labour, elevates his mechanical labour into an art. Pursuing this "Practical" portion of his theme, the author treats of the Gregorian and Anglican Chant, very fairly, as we think, reproducing the arguments for and against Gregorianism, and quoting a powerful attack on its principles from the late Mr. Henry Smart's preface to his "Choral Book," in which he says that it is "a style of music utterly barbarous in itself, antagonistic to the grammatical structure of the language, and so wholly opposed to the feeling of the people that it can never come into general use, except on the incredible supposition of a second universal ascendancy of the church which invented it." In the remarks upon the "Harmony Proper for Congregational Music," many truths are given forth respecting the treatment of vocal parts, and it is truly said that there are many good instrumentalists who know not how to write for voices. "The old counterpoint," Mr. Curwen reminds us, "was born of singing rather than of playing. It comes to us from a time when instruments were feeble and imperfect, and it studied that smooth motion of the parts which is so effective in vocal harmony. The later tunes, bearing traces of the glee or the Handelian chorus, are no less distinctly vocal. Effects that are congenial to voices are studied, and what voices cannot do is carefully avoided. Nowadays composers of hymn-tunes write for the organ, and seldom stop to consider whether what they write can be sung." After observing that the tunes of the late Dr. Dykes are excellent examples of the judicious use of free harmonies—an assertion which we think few will dispute—the author gives illustrations of the "Old Hundredth" harmonised in the styles of the Past, Present, and Future, acknowledging, however, that the specimen of the "Future" is a reductio ad absurdum of the modern chromatic style, although we must admit that the caricature is hardly so violent as it appears to those who have not to wade through a large quantity of the music recently written for the Church. The third part of the work, headed "Descriptive," contains some graphic accounts of the manner in which the services are conducted at the various places of worship in the metropolis. Interesting is it indeed—especially at this time—to record some of the opinions of Mr. Henry Smart respecting the manner in which he fulfilled his duties at St. Pancras Church, of which he was for many years organist. It is tolerably well known that, as a real artist, he placed his art foremost in all his professional dealings with those who were utterly ignorant of the subject to which he had devoted his life. Conversing on the manner in which he encouraged congregational singing at his church, he said: "Of course some of the people don't like it. They want a choir, and would like to sing the tunes fast. Now, I won't play the tunes fast, and I tell them why. First, because it is vulgar; second, because it is musically wrong (for all music has its proper time); and third, because there is no authority for fast playing. 'O,' they say, 'don't you know that — and — take the tunes fast?' And who are these? They are men altogether too young to be quoted as authorities. Those who have had the longest experience—such, for instance, as Goss, Hopkins, and the late George Cooper—are the authorities, and they take the tunes slowly. Often you will find that this quick singing is the act of the clergy, and not of the organist. Sometimes I am told that the congregation would like to sing more quickly; but I answer that I am the best judge of their inclinations, and I have a good deal of trouble to keep them up to their present speed. We do not believe in notes of double length at the beginnings of lines; they are ugly. But we make a slight pause between each line." Mr. Curwen also says something of the services at the Jewish Synagogues. In these it is well known that instruments are forbidden; yet we are told that a harmonium has crept in at Bayswater, but only on the understanding that it is never to be used except at weddings, which are not celebrated on the Sabbath. One great merit in Mr. Curwen's book is that, although he expresses his opinions freely, he is at least courteous to all who hold different views; and even those who disagree with him, therefore, will derive much pleasure from the perusal of a work which is evidently the result both of patient labour and earnest thought.

Irish Songs and Ballads. By Alfred Perceval Graves. [Manchester: Alexander Ireland and Co.]

THIS volume, charming as it is to those who love true poetry, and more especially that which reflects and sympathises with, the best side of the Irish character, would have been excluded from review in this journal had the author not drawn our attention to some of the national airs to which his verses are wedded by printing twenty-seven of them in a musical appendix at the end of the book. Some half-dozen of these, Mr. Graves tells us, arranged as songs by Mr. Joseph Robinson, have been published separately by Messrs. Cramer, Wood and Co., of Westmorland Street, Dublin; and, as agents in the cause of good and healthy music, allied with natural and essentially Irish poetry, we trust they will have an extensive sale. The author need scarcely, perhaps, have said in his preface that most of the songs and ballads in the volume "if not actually composed to the music of old Irish airs, owe to them their prime impulse and complete character," for the verses sing as naturally to the melodies as if the notes were printed over the words; but there are some which we can read over without any thought of their alliance with music, and these are decidedly amongst the very best in the book. A few Bardic Lyrics are also closely translated from the Celtic, and a long poem, "The Fairy Branch," is given, avowedly "as an experiment in the poetical treatment of early Irish tales"; but these, although clever, please us not so much as the genuine national songs and ballads, which are replete with that humour and pathos so thoroughly characteristic of the Irish peasantry.

The Student's Helmholtz. Musical Acoustics; or, The Phenomena of Sound, as connected with Music. By John Broadhouse. [William Reeves.]

THE first title of this book would unquestionably lead students to suppose that it is merely a condensed version of the theories of the great acoustical authority for the use of those who are preparing for a musical examination at the Universities. This, however, is by no means the case; for, although Helmholtz's "Sensations of Tone" is largely drawn upon, the works of Drs. Pole, Airy, Tyndall, and Stone, and Mr. Sedley Taylor are consulted and quoted from; and use is also made of Stainer and Barrett's "Dictionary of Musical Terms." In his preface the author says, "The object of the present book is to give, in one volume, a good general view of the subject to those who can neither spare time to read nor money to buy a number of large and expensive works." A perusal of the book justifies us in asserting that this design is most satisfactorily carried out; and it is not too much to say that, although the plan of the work precludes the possibility of minutely dissecting every subject treated upon, any careful reader may obtain so clear an insight into the principles of acoustics as to enable him not only to pass an examination, but to store up a large amount of general knowledge upon the phenomena of sound. It would be useless to transfer to our pages any portion of the volume before us, because fragments of an explanation of points in science confuse rather than enlighten, the earnest searcher after truth. We may say, however, that the most important parts of Helmholtz's work are extracted whenever a truth has to be enforced, and that many judicious quotations from the other authors we have mentioned are also given. As accuracy is especially necessary in such a work, the author's attention should be drawn to the table at page 294, where the unison D, instead of C, is printed, and a perfect fourth, instead of a major second.

Organs and Organ Building. A Treatise on the History and Construction of the Organ, from its origin to the present day; with important Specifications. By C. A. Edwards. ["The Bazaar" Office, 170, Strand, W.C.]

THIS is a most exhaustive and excellent book on the subject of which it treats. It is divided into three parts, entitled, History, Construction, and Specification. In the first part there are many not commonly known facts and much useful information, such as interesting accounts of early organ-builders, among whom are Wotton, Loosemore, Dallan, Schmidt, Harris, Byfield, &c. The second part, which is by far the most voluminous, contains all that an organist can possibly require to know with regard to the construction of the organ. Of course, mechanical contrivances are always more or less difficult to comprehend from an engraving; yet we think that, with a little earnest consideration, everything might be understood from them. The third part is especially interesting, as it gives specifications of nearly or quite all the cathedral organs, as well as other large ones in our public halls, &c. We are sorry not to be able to give a more detailed account of the work, but we think we have said enough to show that it is worthy of a place in the library of every organist.

Autrefois. Allegretto; composé pour le Piano par Brinley Richards. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

WE are glad to find that Mr. Richards is writing original pieces, instead of "arrangements," because, as we have always said, in supplying the market even with such saleable materials as we invariably expect from him, he scarcely does justice to his undoubted power for composition. The trifle now before us is instinct with the feeling of "other days"; and although we should have preferred this feeling to be expressed in English, instead of French, the universal language in which it is illustrated will render the piece acceptable to pianists of all nations. The pleasing character of the theme, and the quaint diatonic harmonies with which it is accompanied throughout lift this little sketch above the ordinary level of the reminiscences of the olden time, on which so many composers of the present day employ their talents.

Reeves's Musical Directory for 1881. [William Reeves.]

THIS Directory is materially increased in bulk since its last issue; and we are told in the preface that "the alterations and corrections have been very large and extensive." We regret, however, to observe that the advertisements are still mixed up with the body of the work, and that the addresses of several members of the musical profession do not appear. It is true that many persons may have neglected to furnish the required information; but those who refer to a Directory will certainly not rest satisfied with such a reason for finding it incomplete; and that it is so, we need only mention the omission of the names of such eminent professors as Messrs. T. Harper, W. H. Holmes, Lazarus, Radcliff, C. Severn, and Willy.

I wish I could go home. Song. Words by Elizabeth D. Cross. Composed by C. A. Ranken.

[Duncan Davison and Co.]

It is not often that we have to express regret at the excellence of the music in songs sent to us for review; but when we believe that this will inevitably lift into prominence words which must cause pain to the majority of listeners in a drawing-room, we cannot but feel sorrow that the melancholy poet has been united with so sympathetic a musical ally. In a darkened room, and in the silence of affliction, the song might be appropriate enough; but amidst the light and life of a festive gathering such purely domestic pathos should have no place. We shall be glad again to meet with this composer, for her music is far above the average of the vocal works which come before us for notice.

Tarantelle, pour le Piano, à quatre mains. Composé par Horatio Tuddenham. [Augener and Co.]

MR. TUDDENHAM has written a capital Tarantelle, in F minor, full of life and with sufficient variety to avoid creating that sense of monotony so often experienced in listening to this dance music. Being originally composed as a duet, many effects are obtainable which, if possible, would be extremely difficult in a solo. We particularly admire the second subject, in D⁷ major, which is not only good in itself, but forms an excellent contrast with the opening theme. The composer will, we are certain, thank us for directing his attention to page 12, where, in the third bar from the end, the omission of the bass clef may cause some amateurs without ears to play in fifths with the primo part.

The Illustrated Opera Series. Wagner's Grand Romantic Opera, "Lohengrin." Translated and arranged by John P. Jackson. The Musical Gems, for Voice and Piano. Arranged by Frances Manette Jackson. [David Bogue.]

THE idea of this work is extremely good; and if carried out as well as in the specimen before us, should appeal forcibly to the lovers of the lyrical drama. The Opera selected is excellently suited both for pictorial and musical illustration; but it may be a question whether some others can be as effectively laid out. The portrait of Wagner, and view of Monsalvat, the Castle of the Holy Grail, are most attractive.

The Musical Directory, Annual and Almanack for 1881. [Rudall, Carte and Co.]

THE twenty-ninth issue of this work is in every respect thoroughly satisfactory. The alphabetical arrangement of the names of country professors (commenced last year) removes every objection that could possibly be made to the Directory as a ready means of reference; and the opening article contains a faithful record of the principal musical events of the past year.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AFTER an existence of nearly half a century, during which time it occupied the foremost rank amongst French journals devoted to musical art, the Revue et Gazette Musicale has, we regret to state, discontinued its issues with the past year. The high artistic standard maintained by our late contemporary throughout its long career renders its discontinuance a serious loss to the musical world generally, and we can only express a hope that the possibility of its re-appearance at some future time, held forth in the last issue of the journal in question, may be speedily realised.

Herr August Wilhelmj will shortly terminate his prolonged triumphal tour in the United States of America, whence he will return to his native town of Wiesbaden.

Herr Xaver Scharwenka, the gifted pianist and talented composer, has recently caused a furor by the performance, at the Philharmonic Society at Vienna, of his second Piano-forte Concerto before a numerous and critical audience.

A second edition of Ambros' meritorious "History of Music" is being issued, in numbers, by the firm of F. E. C. Leuckart, of Leipzig. M. Gevaert, of the Brussels Conservatoire, has just published the second volume of his "History of Ancient Music."

We are glad to notice in German journals the success achieved by Herr Max Friedländer during his recent concert-tour in that country, where his talents as a vocalist have evidently been fully appreciated.

The memorial in honour of Joseph Haydn, to be erected at the Esterhazy Gardens of Vienna, is approaching its completion, and will most likely be unveiled in the coming spring.

King Louis of Bavaria has, it is stated, contributed the sum of M300,000 towards the realisation of the intended performance in 1882 of Wagner's "Parsifal," and there appears to be no longer any doubt as to the scheme being carried out. The new work, like the "Tetralogy," will be produced at Bayreuth, the poet-composer having already concluded the engagement of the leading executive artists.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" was recently performed, for the first time, at Ghent, where it met with a most enthusiastic reception.

Gluck's "Alceste" has been magnificently mounted at the Leipzig Stadt Theater, and notwithstanding the, for modern audiences, somewhat tedious progress of its action, the work has excited much interest. A "cyclus" of performances of the great reformer's operas was announced to take place at the same establishment from the 23rd to the 30th of last month, including "Orpheus," "Iphigenia in Aulis," "Iphigenia in Tauris," "Alceste," and "Armidia," thus affording a rare opportunity for the study of a highly characteristic and important phase in the development of modern opera-drama.

The melodrama of "Preciosa," immortalised by Weber's music, has just been revived at the Royal Theatre at Cassel, where the work was first performed in 1821, the present being the one hundredth time of its production there.

Madame Pauline Lucca will, it is said, shortly appear in the character of Elsa, in "Lohengrin," at the Imperial Opera of Vienna. This will be the first time of the diva's representing one of the heroines of the Wagnerian muse.

Rubinstein's new opera, "The Demon," continues to be performed to crowded and enthusiastic audiences at the Opera in Moscow.

We read in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, of an interesting and successful experiment made with the telephone, on the occasion of a concert recently given by Anton Rubinstein, at the Theatre of Neufchâtel. The building had been connected with the Hôtel de Ville by several instruments, in addition to which some microphones had been placed at a distance of five mètres from the pianoforte, the result being that the performance of the great pianist was, it is said, heard with equal distinctness at both places.

Some excellent concerts have been given at Florence (at the instigation of an English lady) by the Società Orchestrale Fiorentina, the performances being, as a correspondent assures us, of the first order throughout.

According to the latest issue of Paloschi's Almanacco Musicale, no less than 40,000 operas have been produced since the year 1600, of which number 10,000 fall to the share of the Italians.

An opera, by Baron E. Tschiderer, entitled "The Lady of Gretna Green," the libretto by Mosenthal, has been performed with success at the Theatre of Salzburg.

Madame Lemmens-Sherrington has been nominated to the vocal professorship at the Royal Conservatoire of Brussels.

At the Imperial Opera of Vienna a "cyclus" of performances of Meyerbeer's most important operas is in course of preparation, under the auspices of its new director, Herr Jahn.

The maestro Marchetti is engaged upon a new opera, entitled "La Figlia di Rolando."

At Frankfurt died, on December 31, 1880, Franz Kunkel, highly esteemed as a musical savant, and author of some important works bearing upon the theory of the art.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—From "Orchestral Notation" to "Tonic Sol-fa" may or may not be a very short step: either way, the discussion which has been going on for some time in your columns has, almost insensibly, glided from one to the other.

It is no slight proof of the efficiency of the established notation that there are two sets of reformers aiming at improvement in diametrically opposite directions. One party would annihilate transposed notation for instruments, retaining only the fixed staff; the other would abolish the fixed staff for voices, and employ only the transposing syllables of the Tonic Sol-fa. Both, I venture to think, are equally mistaken.

If an instrumentalist by merely changing his instrument (or a small portion of it) can, by the same manipulation, produce music in different keys, he will naturally prefer a notation corresponding, not to the pitch of the sounds he produces, but to the means of producing them. This may make it more difficult for a tyro to read a score, but the convenience of the performer is the first consideration; and it is much more to the purpose for the notation to tell a man what he has to do than to inform him of the result of his doing it. It is quite a mistake to suppose the staff invariably "denotes absolute pitch as its principal thing": at every period of its history it seems to have lent itself readily to transposition. Church music written on the four-lined staff has been transposed from time immemorial. The solo-violin part of Ernst's "Carnaval de Venise," though written in A, is really played in B \flat , every string of the violin being drawn up a semitone higher than its usual pitch. The accord du violon is altered for the sake of brilliancy, but the performer fingers each note as though his violin were tuned in the ordinary manner. The common method of indicating artificial harmonics on stringed instruments does not show the pitch of the sounds produced, but merely the execution. Other instances need not be cited to prove that no real inconvenience, on the contrary, much advantage, is found in the judicious transposition of the staff.

Transposition is out of place for only one instrument that I know of; that is, the human voice. Other instruments may be made larger or smaller, may have transposing keyboards; may have their strings slackened or tightened; but the vocal apparatus cannot be so metamorphosed. If a descendant of Adam could change his trachea, or his larynx as a trumpeter changes his crook, then perhaps the Tonic Sol-fa might be accepted by all singers as the most suitable notation for vocal music. That it is not so accepted is shown by your remarks on page 18 of the current issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES. It appears that not a few of those who have abandoned the old notation on account of its alleged difficulty, hoping to find in the Tonic Sol-fa some royal road to sight-singing, have been disappointed: one reason for this is, I believe, that the Tonic Sol-fa is built upon an error.

According to Mr. Curwen (see page 2 of the "Tonic Sol-fa Primer"), "The fact that to singers one key is the same as another is the basis of the Tonic Sol-fa Notation." Now

I very much doubt whether any two keys are really the same to any singer. A very slight examination of the Voice Modulator on page 106 of the "Standard Course" will make this clear. It is well known that the compass of the human voice (like that of most instruments) is divided by certain "breaks" into "registers," and that it is of the highest importance that these breaks should always be crossed at the right place. The Voice Modulator shows that no two keys cross all the breaks at the same degrees of their scales, and that, consequently, no key is the same as another to the singer. Take, for example, the keys of A and C (practically identical, be it observed, to the clarinet-player when he changes his instrument). In the key of A (if the Voice Modulator be right) the dominant and the submediant may be sung safely in the "thick" register; in C they must both be taken in the "thin." This circumstance makes a serious difference in the "effect" of the music sung, and explains why many songs, written for low voices, lose their charm when transposed into higher keys, and vice versa. I would advise all who think of taking up the Tonic Sol-fa to look closely into this matter, and to compare for themselves the crossing of all the breaks in every possible pair of keys.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. CONWAY BROWN, L. Mus. and F.T.C.L.

THAYER'S "BEETHOVEN."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Your numerous readers will be as sorry to hear as I am to communicate the fact that there is but little hope of the immediate publication of the fourth and last volume of this important work. Mr. Thayer is suffering greatly at present from an old cerebral disease, which quite unfits him for any work beyond that inseparable from his official position as American Consul at Trieste. May this illness be of the shortest possible duration.

JOHN TOWERS.

Manchester, January 20, 1881.

We have received a letter from Dr. Verrinder informing us that an agent on the other side of the Atlantic has been "requested to make certain inquiries respecting a gentleman who is borrowing his (Dr. Verrinder's) name and reputation" in America. As a professor of music, from London, he also says, some time ago took the liberty of assuming his name and degree in Canada, we willingly give publicity to his assertion that he "has not left, and does not intend to leave his native land."

MR. T. L. SOUTHGATE writes to say "that in Vols. 2, 3 and 4, of the Musical Standard appears a series of no fewer than thirteen articles by the late Mr. G. W. Hammond, giving every extract from Pepys's Diary relating to music, and explanations where necessary." Never having seen the Musical Standard, or Mr. Hammond's thirteen articles, I cannot say what they are worth. But Mr. Southgate's statement that they contain "every extract relating to music" must be an error, for the simple reason that they were evidently written before the edition of the Diary by the Rev. Mynors Bright was published. Any one in the least familiar with the subject knows that the earlier edition of the work by Lord Braybrooke is very incomplete, more especially as regards musical matters.—F. H.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

. Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

T. CHAPMAN.—Our correspondent's letter contains nothing upon the subject which has not been already said in these columns.

FRANK MAJOR.—The letter of our correspondent is only one of many we receive from those who forward us notices of Concerts which are not inserted. As we have selected Mr. Major's communication, we will inform him that no date was given in the account of his Concert; but, as we cannot look through the vast correspondence of the last month to satisfy other inquirers, let them rest assured that no notice is thrown aside without a sufficient reason, and that in future, therefore, letters upon this subject to the Editor will remain unanswered.

W. JORDAN.—The work mentioned is exceedingly good, but whether "the best" should be decided by the master under whom you study.

A. T. F.—Violone is the original Italian name given to the contrabasso or double-bass of our orchestras.

K. B. C.—Those works which have stood the test of time may certainly be termed "classical"; but in music the word is generally used to denote compositions written according to the models left us by the great masters.

A POOR STUDENT.—A selection from "Novello's Music Primers" will furnish you with all the information which can be gleaned from books; but you cannot achieve your object without the aid and counsel of a competent and experienced master.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERDEEN.—The Aberdeen Musical Association gave its first Concert of the season on Monday, December 27. The first part consisted of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, the second being miscellaneous. The solo parts were exceedingly well sung by members of the Association, the duet, "My song shall be always Thy mercy," being especially good. Gaul's admirable part-song, "The Silent Land" and Södermann's "Peasant Wedding March" were well rendered and much appreciated. The members of the Aberdeen Philharmonic Society did justice to the instrumental music of the Lothgesang, and the whole performance reflected much credit on the Conductor, Herr. Aug. Reiter.

AUCKLAND, N.Z.—A banquet was given on November 9, in the Insurance Buildings, by the eminent firm of Messrs. William McArthur and Co., to celebrate the occasion of its senior member, Mr. Alderman McArthur, M.P., being installed as Lord Mayor of London. The whole of the lower floor of the Insurance Buildings was draped with flags of every nation and colour. The western end of the hall was carpeted and fitted as a reception room for the guests. Each visitor was received personally by Mr. C. C. McMillan and Mr. F. Larkins, the resident members of the firm. An excellent selection of vocal and instrumental music was performed, under the direction of Mr. Gordon Gooch, assisted by Mrs. Mitchell, Miss May Hastings, Mrs. Revett, and Mr. T. Burnham.

BABBACOMBE, TORQUAY.—The Christmas Services at All Saints' Church were accompanied by a band of ten performers, in addition to the organ. At the Communion Service, Mozart's First Mass was sung, and gave great satisfaction to the congregation. The musical arrangements were under the care of the Organist of the church, Mr. C. R. Fowles. A Miscellaneous Concert was given by the Choir of All Saints' Church on December 30, with the aid of some lady residents and the band that accompanied the Christmas Festival at All Saints' Church.

BANFF.—The Musical Association's Concert, on the 21st ult., comprised, besides Gade's Erl King's Daughter, an excellent selection of music, both vocal and instrumental. The soloists (vocal) were Mrs. Barclay, Miss I. Dickson, Miss Coutts, Mr. A. Simpson, and Mr. Williamson; and (instrumental) Misses B. Ramsay, Murray, J. Ross, G. Williamson, and Herr Hoffmann. The programme was excellently rendered, the Cantata producing a great effect. Herr Hoffmann conducted.

BELFAST.—The performance of Sir Michael Costa's Oratorio, Eli, by the Philharmonic Society in the Ulster Hall, on December 21, was not only the most praiseworthy effort of the Society, but one of the very finest oratorio performances ever heard in Belfast. The choruses were admirably given throughout. Mr. Ludwig, who sang the music of Eli, gave with much effect the fine air, "Let the people praise Thee," and the duet, "Lord, cause Thy face," was well sung by Mr. Ludwig and Mr. George Benson. Mr. Shakespeare, who sang all the tenor part, is always tasteful, correct, and thoroughly refined. Great praise is due to Mr. Benson for his singing of the part of the Prophet; and Madame Mary Cummings was heard to great advantage in the music for Samuel. Mdlle. Welmi, who sang the soprano music, possesses a good and highly-cultured voice, though of limited power. The florid air, "I will extol Thee," was brilliantly rendered, and well deserved the applause with which it was greeted. Herr Beyschlag, who conducted this Concert, is to be congratulated upon its success. The organ part in the Oratorio was excellently played by Mr. John Shillington. The largeness of the attendance at Herr Adolf Beyschlag's Pianoforte Recital, which took place in the Assembly Hall, May Street, on the 4th ult., cannot be regarded but in a promising light, whether it is assumed that the audience were attracted by a desire to become better acquainted with some of the choicest pianoforte compositions that were ever written, or with the capabilities of the new Conductor of the Philharmonic Society. Herr Beyschlag proved himself to be a most thoughtful and accomplished pianist; his powers of execution are great, and his method thoroughly artistic. The programme was excellently selected from the works of the great masters. Herr Beyschlag preluded his playing of each selection with a few biographical and critical remarks.

BIRMINGHAM.—The annual performance of the Messiah, by the Festival Choral Society, took place in the Town Hall, on Monday, December 27. The principal vocalists were Miss Marriott, Miss Orridge, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Thurley Beale. There was a large orchestra, with Mr. Robinson as solo trumpet. Mr. Stimpson was at the organ, and Mr. Stockley conducted. The performance was a very fine one, and there was, as usual, an overflowing audience. The third Concert of the current series was given by the Philharmonic Union in the Town Hall, on Tuesday, December 28. The programme included the first two parts of Haydn's Creation, and a miscellaneous selection. Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Blower were the vocal principals. There was a full band and chorus, and the Concert was most successfully carried out under the conductorship of Dr. C. S. Heap. Mr. H. R. Bickley, the popular alto, gave a Concert in the Town Hall, on Friday, December 31. The executants comprised the Birmingham Glee Union (Messrs. Bickley, Woodhall, Young, and Campion) and Miss Emilie Lloyd, vocalists, and the band of the 2nd Life Guards, under the direction of Mr. W. Winterbottom. A miscellaneous programme was provided, which afforded satisfaction to a large audience. Mr. Stockley's second Orchestral Concert took place in the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 20th ult. The programme comprised Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Mendelssohn's Overture to Ruy Blas, Beethoven's Leonora (No. 3), and, as novelties, Berlioz's "Danse des Sylphes," from La Damnation de Faust, and the Largo arranged from Handel, by Hellmesberger. The vocalists were Fräulein Heffelmann, Madame Patey, and Mr. Maas. The orchestra, which numbers upwards of sixty, and, with four exceptions, consists of local performers, is now highly efficient, and reflects the greatest credit upon the organiser and conductor, Mr. W. C. Stockley.

The cheap Concerts of the Musical Association continue their successful career. The most noticeable of recent performances being the repetition, by desire, of Mendelssohn's Elijah, which took place on Saturday, the 15th ult., the audience numbering close upon 3,000. The Holte Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. C. J. Stevens, were the performers. On Saturday, the 22nd ult., the Midland Musical Society, conducted by Mr. H. M. Stevenson, with Miss Fraser Brunner, Mr. S. Roper, and Mr. Horrex, as principals, gave a very successful performance, with full band and organ, of Haydn's Creation, when there was again a very large and enthusiastic audience.

BISHOP AUCKLAND.—On Monday, December 20, the Auckland Musical Society gave a Christmas performance of Handel's Messiah, with full band and chorus of 150 performers, under the conductorship of Mr. Kilburn; principals, Miss H. Tomlinson, Miss M. Tomlinson, Mr. Verney Binns, Mr. John Burgin, Mr. J. H. Brotherton, Mr. W. Brotherton, and Mdlle. Bertha Brouil. The performance was in every respect a marked success, the choruses especially being rendered with great intelligence and spirit. The hall was crowded in every part.

BRADFORD.—Handel's Messiah was given in the Church of St. Mary Magdalene, on Monday, the 24th ult., with full band and organ. The solos were sung by Mrs. Brook-Myers, Mrs. Ter-Meer, Mr. J. Wright, and Mr. Charlesworth Prince. Master F. A. Sewell presided at the organ. Mr. G. F. Sewell was the Conductor. This being the first occasion of an Oratorio being performed in Church in Bradford, great interest was excited, and the sacred edifice was filled with an attentive and devotional audience. The expenses were met by a collection, which quite covered the necessary outlay.

BRIGG.—A Concert was given by Mr. Cray's Choral Society, in the Exchange Hall, on the evening of Tuesday, the 18th ult., before a large audience. The choral portion of the first part was selected from the Messiah, Haydn's Second Mass, Dettingen Te Deum, Acis and Galatea, &c. The band and chorus numbered about ninety. The soloists were Miss Marie Thompson, Miss Lavinia Rowbottom, Mr. G. H. Gregory, Mus. Bac., and Mr. A. Phillips. The choruses were sung with vigour and effect, and the soloists acquitted themselves to the satisfaction of the audience. The second part consisted of secular songs, glees, &c. Miss Bertie Mitchell acted as accompanist, and Mr. C. W. Cray, Organist of the parish church, was the Conductor.

BURNLEY.—At Holy Trinity Church, on Christmas Eve, Farmer's Oratorio, Christ and His Soldiers, was performed, Mr. R. Watson, Organist of the church, conducting; and Mr. J. E. Gaul, Organist of St. Matthew's, Burnley, presiding at the organ. The choruses were rendered with much precision and firmness, and the treble and contralto solos were well sung by boys selected from the choir. A feature in the Oratorio was the singing of the Rev. T. Taylor-Evans, B.A., in the song, "Our Blest Redeemer"; and also that of the Rev. R. W. P. Montgomery, who sang the bass solos.

CHELTEMHAM.—The Musical Society has placed in rehearsal J. F. Barnett's new Cantata, The Building of the Ship, and Weber's Opera, Preciosa, with a view to the performance of these works at their Concert in May next.

CLIFTON.—On Thursday, the 13th ult., the Bristol Madrigal Society gave its annual Ladies' Night at the Victoria Rooms. It is usual on these occasions for the choir of the Society to be strengthened by competent artists from the principal choirs in the neighbouring and distant towns, and for this Concert it had been made up to a total of 102 voices. The choir was conducted by Mr. D. W. Rootham, the Society's Conductor, and the programme was admirably rendered throughout. Some very fine examples of the old madrigal composers were given, all of which were excellently sung. A number of works of a different type, by modern composers, was also performed, and most warmly received; and the fact that so large a selection was allowed in the programme of a madrigal society, shows that in Bristol the management is, to some extent, willing to favour the popular taste. Indeed, a very excellent, though varied, programme was presented, and it is undoubtedly true that the success of the forty-fifth annual ladies' night was due to the efforts of the excellent Secretary, Mr. Edward A. Harvey, and to the skill of Mr. Rootham in training his forces so creditably. On Monday, the 17th ult., a Concert was given in the Victoria Rooms, in aid of the building fund of the Church of St. Saviours', Woolcot Park, Redland, but the extremely inclement weather prevented a large audience from attending. The vocalists were Miss Kate Shackell, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. Lawford Huxtable; and the instrumentalists Mr. A. W. Waite (violin), Mr. Louis Waite (violinello), Mr. J. O. Brooke (clarinet), Mr. Owen Williams (organ), and Mr. J. V. Tittle (piano). An excellent programme was arranged, and the execution of it was exceedingly good.

DARLINGTON.—On Tuesday evening, December 21, a Pianoforte Recital was given by Mr. W. Crawford, jun., in the Mechanics' Hall. The programme embraced selections from the works of Beethoven, Donizetti, and Mendelssohn. His performance was highly meritorious, showing a facile mastery of his art, the most difficult passages being executed with a brilliancy and softness that left nothing to be desired. The cornet solos, by Mr. J. Crawford, were admirably rendered. The vocal portion of the entertainment was divided between Mr. Nutton, of Durham Cathedral, and Mr. Bowness. Master Blackett astonished everybody by his masterly execution on the violin. He handles the bow with the finish of an adept, and plays boldly, firmly, and correctly, reflecting the highest credit on his tutor, Mr. W. Crawford. Mr. Boynes acted as accompanist.

DONCASTER.—The Messiah was performed on the 11th ult., in the Corn Exchange, under the auspices of the Mayor, Mr. Meacock. The solo vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. Thurlay Beale. Mr. Villin, of Her Majesty's Opera, led the orchestra of fifty performers, and the chorus numbered 230 voices. Mr. R. M. Rogers, Organist of the parish church, officiated at the organ, and the Concert was under the direction and management of Mr. J. M. Kirk.

ECCLÉS.—The members of the Vocal Society gave their first Concert of the season on Monday evening, the 10th ult., in the Co-operative Hall, which was well attended. The principal vocalists were Miss Clara Samueli and Mr. Kendal Thompson; Conductor and soloist, Mr. C. T. Sutcliffe, F.C.O.; accompanist, Mr. J. Barlow. Miss Samueli, who made her first appearance in Ecclès, was highly successful and much appreciated. Mr. Kendal Thompson received encores for his songs, "The sailor's grave" and "The death of Nelson." The pieces sung by the Vocal Society went very steadily, and showed careful training. Mr. Sutcliffe's solos were very tastefully and carefully performed, "Abend Glocken" being encored.

EDINBURGH.—Professor Sir Herbert Oakley gave an Organ Recital in the University Music Class-room, Park Place, on the 13th ult., when there was a large attendance. The programme included Handel's air adapted to "Lord, remember David," Haydn's canzonetta, No. 3, and a Minuetto and Trio in D major, and Beethoven's Romance for the violin, Op. 40.

EGLOSHAYLE, CORNWALL.—A performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul was given in the Parish Church on the 19th ult. by the church choir, assisted by the Rev. E. S. Shuttleworth, Mr. T. Craddock, Mus. Bac., and Messrs. Ward, R. Williams, and H. Williams, of the Upton choir, Torquay. The attendance, in spite of the severe weather, was very good.

ENNISKILLEN.—On Christmas Day the following selection of music was rendered in the Parish Church by the choir, under the direction of Mr. Arnold, Organist and Choirmaster: Opening anthem, "How beautiful upon the mountains," R. A. Smith; Venite, Marsh in A; Proper Psalms, Dr. Beckwith, in D; Te Deum and Jubilate, Dr. J. Clarke-Whitfield's service, in E; Hymn, "Christians awake," Kyrie Eleison, Kramer in E flat; Doxology, M. Arnold, adapted from Tallis; Voluntary during offertory, "He shall feed His flock" (Messiah), Handel; Anthem, "Sing, O heavens," Berthold Tours.

FROME.—Mr. W. H. Cox gave his annual Concert at the Mechanics' Hall, on Tuesday, the 11th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The executants were Miss Laura Cox, pianoforte; Mr. W. A. Cox, piano and harpe cœlienne; Mr. W. E. Cox, violin; Mr. Owen Williams, organ; and Mr. A. Collard, flute. Mr. P. W. Cruttwell, a member of the Amateur Orchestral Guild, rendered valuable assistance on the cornet in the concerted music. The principal vocalists were Miss Grace Godolphin, who sang three songs with much effect, Mr. Henry Morgan, and Mr. Frank Heyman.

GEORGETOWN, DEMERARA.—The Christmas Organ Recital, with orchestra and chorus, given in Christ Church on December 23, was in every respect highly interesting. The church was crowded, and the performance listened to with the keenest attention. Mr. Colbeck presided at the organ. The collection, which was in aid of the Potaro Mission, is believed to have reached a handsome sum.

GLOUCESTER.—The second Concert of the Choral Society for the present season was given on Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., at the Shire Hall. Handel's Judas Maccabeus was the work selected for performance. The principal singers were Miss Marian Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Brandon. Mr. C. H. Lloyd presided at the organ, and Mr. J. Hunt conducted. The performance as a whole was very satisfactory, and fully maintained the credit of the Society.

GREAT MARLOW.—Assisted by Miss M. Cockburn, R.A.M., Miss Wethered, Mr. A. L. Fryer, and Mr. A. G. Crane, the Great Marlow Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Handel's Messiah on the 11th ult., before a very large audience. The band and chorus numbered nearly 100 performers, and each item was most effectively rendered. Mr. T. Hill was leader, and Mr. F. W. J. Chaundy Conductor.

GREENOCK.—The Greenock Choral Union, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Westwood Tosh, gave its annual performance of the Messiah (being the second Concert of this season) on Monday evening, December 20. The principals were Mrs. Smith, Miss Alice F. Young, Mr. Macpherson, and Mr. Currie; the two gentlemen being members of the Union. Mr. Poulter was Organist, and Mr. W. H. Cole leader of the orchestra. The Concert proved in every respect a brilliant success. — A conspicuously new departure in church services in Greenock was very successfully inaugurated on the 9th ult., in the Mid Parish Church, when choirs from various Established Churches in town met and led the congregational singing, under the conductorship of Mr. Methven, with organ accompaniment by Mr. Middleton. The service included several well-known hymns, the anthem "Arise, shine, for Thy light is come," and organ voluntaries. The rendering of all the choral music reflected the utmost credit upon the choirs, considering that they had practised under their respective leaders, and had only had one rehearsal with Messrs. Middleton and Methven. It must also be said that the organ voluntaries were excellently played by Mr. Middleton. A sermon, referring in fitting language to the special nature of the evening services, was preached by the Rev. Mr. Peters.

HADLEIGH.—On Wednesday evening, December 29, an evening Concert was given at the Town Hall, by the Hadleigh Choral Society, assisted by Madame Worrell, Miss Broome, Mr. Edward Dalzell, and Mr. R. De Lacy. The first part of the Concert was devoted to Barnett's Cantata, The Ancient Mariner; and the second part was miscellaneous. Miss Hardacre presided at the piano, Mr. G. A. Hardacre at the harmonium, and Mr. W. H. Hitchcock, the Hadleigh choir-master, conducted the Concert. The programme was capitally rendered; and it may be confidently asserted that this was by far the best Concert yet given by the Society.

HAMBLEDON.—On Wednesday, December 22, an Organ Recital was given by Mr. P. J. Colson (Organist of All Saints', Southampton), on the new instrument, in the Parish Church, built by Mr. H. C. Sims, of Onslow Road, Southampton. The programme was well selected, and the performer effectively displayed the excellent qualities of the organ.

HANLEY.—On Thursday evening, the 6th ult., the Hanley and Shelton Philharmonic Society performed Handel's Oratorio, the Messiah, in the Music Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Yates, Miss L. Yates, Mr. Frank Boyle, and Mr. Frederick King. The chorus, which, with the band, numbered 200, consisted entirely of local performers. Mr. T. Ward, of Birmingham, was the leader. Both chorus and band afforded satisfactory proof of careful training on the part of Mr. F. Mountford, the Conductor. The trumpet obligato, by Mr. Robinson, was a masterly performance, and elicited warm marks of approbation.

HOLLINWOOD.—On Sunday, the 2nd ult., a Special Service was held in the Congregational Church, when a selection from Haydn's Creation was sung by the choir, the solos being effectively given by Mr. G. Chadderton and Mr. T. Allen. Mr. Thomas Walsh conducted, and Mr. J. E. Meal presided at the organ.

HULL.—Handel's Messiah was performed before a crowded audience in Jarratt Street Hall, on December 21, when Mr. Stephenson, the Conductor, took his benefit. The principal artists were Miss A. Hallowell, Miss G. Damian, Mr. H. Parratt, and Mr. A. M'Call.

HULME.—A Musical Service was given in the George Street Wesleyan Chapel on Monday evening, December 20, under the direction of Mr. S. J. Bradburn, Organist of the chapel. The principal vocalists were Miss F. Brooks, Miss Cowburn, Miss A. Enoch, Miss Webster, Miss Kenyon, and Messrs. A. Marsland and W. H. Hesketh, all of whom were highly efficient. The music was selected with much judgment, and all the choruses excellently given by a choir of about sixty voices. The organ solos were also well performed.

ILFRACOMBE.—The members of the Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's Messiah at the Oxford Hall on Thursday, December 30. The band and chorus were very efficient. The principal artists were Miss Kate Hicks, Miss Gertrude Hicks, Mr. John M. Hayden, and Mr. Arthur Crick, all of whom deservedly succeeded in winning the good will and hearty applause of the audience, in their respective solos. Mrs. Willis presided at the harmonium, and Miss Francis at the pianoforte. Mr. Willis conducted.

IPSWICH.—An excellent Concert was given at the Lecture Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., by the members of St. Matthew's Choral Society, conducted by Mr. T. Palmer, Mus. Bac. The first part comprised Dr. Bridge's Cantata Boadicea, the Queen of the Iceni, with full orchestral accompaniments, Mr. F. C. Hunnibell acting as leader of the band. The principal vocalists were Miss Janet Souby, Miss Broome, and Mr. Wigg, all of whom were highly effective. The choruses were finely sung throughout, giving ample evidence of the excellent training the choir had received from Mr. Palmer. The second part was miscellaneous.

KIRKCALDY.—On New Year's Day, at noon, the Building Committee of the New Free Church, accompanied by a few friends, met in the Church to hear the new chiming which have been hung in the belfry. They are eleven in number, and situated high up within the tower, being arranged in two tiers above each other, stretching from side to side of the belfry. They are not loosely swung, but the crown of each bell is firmly bolted and rivetted to a huge cross beam, there being one beam for each tier. The lower tier contains the five largest bells, and the upper row the six smallest. The size of the largest is over four feet diameter, and the smallest seems to be under three feet. They are pitched in the key of B flat, and range from F up to G, with flat seventh and sharp subdominant. In front of each row of bells runs a long plank, on which the hammers are hinged—two hammers for each bell. The hammers are ponderous balls, whose own weight is sufficient to strike a firm blow, and they are held back by means of wire ropes, which pass down some thirty feet to the chamber where the chiming apparatus is placed. This consists of two parts, a strong peculiarly made clock to regulate the time for the chiming or playing to begin, and attached to this a carillon machine, a patent contrivance designed by Messrs. Gillett and Bland (Croydon), the makers of the bells.

LANCASTER.—On December 22, a performance of Elijah was given by the Athenæum Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. F. Dean. The principal parts were sustained by Madame Alice Barth, Miss Palmer, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Henry Pope. The choir was supplemented by several members of the Leeds Festival Chorus, and the band was selected from Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestra. The performance, with one or two exceptions, was an extremely fine one.

LEEDS.—If a stranger to musical matters in Leeds, and to the excellent services to the cause rendered by the Philharmonic Society in particular, desired an evidence of the position and capabilities of that Society, no better one could have been offered him than that which the admirable performance of Professor Macfarren's Oratorio, Joseph, given on the 11th ult., in the Victoria Hall, afforded. The music of Joseph was excellently sung by Mr. Frederick King, a special feature in his rendering of the part being the dialogue where he relates his dreams to his brethren; his two songs, "If I forget thee" and "My spirit is sore moved," being also highly successful. Miss Anna Williams created a marked effect throughout the Oratorio, especially in the solos "Love is strong as death," and "I will open my mouth," both of which elicited the most enthusiastic marks of approbation. Mrs. Alfred Broughton, in the contralto music, and Miss Sellers, who was entrusted with the part of Benjamin, were also thoroughly efficient; Mr. Blower who has a fine bass voice, was heard to much advantage in the music of Jacob, and the tenor parts of Reuben and Pharaoh were allotted to Mr. Boyle, who was warmly applauded for his excellent rendering of the parts. The choir was especially deserving of praise, the final number, "O give thanks," being finely given; nor must mention be omitted of the capital manner in which the chorus of Ishmaelites, with its captivating and effective accompaniment was sung. Mr. Broughton conducted; Mr. A. Broughton presided at the organ; and Signor Risegari presided over the orchestra.

LEICESTER.—The Choral Society on December 30 gave a performance of Haydn's Oratorio, the Creation, at the Temperance Hall. The principal singers were Miss Carrie Blackwell, Mr. D. Jones, and Mrs. G. L. Bevans, all of whom were highly efficient. The choruses were sung with accuracy and spirit, and a commendable attention to light and shade, the most striking perhaps being "The heavens are telling," "Achieved is the glorious work," and the final chorus "Sing the Lord, ye voices." Mr. H. B. Ellis assisted at the harmonium, and accompanied the recitatives and choruses; Mr. Hancock conducting with his usual skill.

LEYBURN.—On Monday, the 10th ult., the Messiah was performed by the Wensleydale Musical Society. The solo vocalists were Miss Emilie Norton, Mr. D. Whitehead, and Mr. H. Rickard. The choir of sixty voices sang remarkably well. They were strengthened by a small but efficient string band and by the organ, played by the Hon. A. L. Orde-Powlett. The attendance was unprecedentedly large. Mr. W. Leggatt conducted. Barnett's Ancient Mariner is in rehearsal, and will be produced at Easter.

MANCHESTER.—Berlioz's Childhood of Christ was given at Mr. Hallé's Concerts on December 30. The performance was of a high order of merit. The singing of the choir reflected the greatest credit on Mr. Hecht, the chorus director; and the fine orchestra gave the elaborate accompaniments with excellent effect. The vocalists were Miss and Mr. Santley, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Signor Foli. Miss Santley's voice is somewhat weak, though her style is good; Mr. Santley and Signor Foli left little to be desired, and the same remark would have applied to Mr. Lloyd, but for his persistent abuse of the portamento.—At the Concert on the following Thursday, Mozart's Serenade, composed in 1776 to celebrate the marriage of Elizabeth Hafner, was given for the first time in England. The Serenade consists of eight movements, two allegros, a rondo, two andantes, and three minuets. They are all remarkable for the flow of melodious ideas, and observance of form characteristic of Mozart, and, if somewhat too similar in style, were nevertheless heard with interest. The opening allegro, which contains some brilliant unison passages, the rondo, which might have suggested to Weber the "Moto perpetuo," and the first and third minuets, are the finest movements. Mr. Hallé played three of Heller's transcriptions of Schubert's songs with the greatest delicacy and finish, and Miss Louisa Pyk displayed a fine voice and excellent intentions, but at present a lack of experience.—At Mr. De Jong's Concerts, on the 8th ult., a musical joke by Mozart, in the form of a Symphony, entitled "The Village Musicians," was of primary interest, and the clever caricature on bad playing and bad writing, the irregular form, the sudden transitions into remote keys, the unrhymed measure, and occasional passages of hopeless cacophony, were productive of much amusement. Dvorak's Slavonian Dance (No. 3), and Berlioz's "Marche Troyenne" were also interesting items. Mr. De Jong gave a flute solo in his usual perfect style, and Madame Patey and Mr. Herbert Reeves were thoroughly successful in their respective selections. On the 22nd ult., Miss Anna Williams, Madame Trebelli, Signor Vizzani, and Signor Zobili were the vocalists; and Mons. Musin contributed solos on the violin.—At the Manchester Vocal Society's Concert, on the 12th ult., Bach's Motet, "Sing ye to the Lord," formed the pièce de resistance, and was very finely rendered. Miss Clara Samuël was the vocalist.—At Mr. Hallé's Concert, on the 13th ult., Gade's Symphony in C minor displayed the Danish composer in his best light. Svendsen's "Rhapsodie Norvegienne," No. 2, was given for the first time. Released from the trammels of form, which in his greater works appear to oppress Svendsen, his talents display themselves in quite a new light; and subjects all strongly marked with national characteristics are treated very ingeniously and scored with most picturesque effect. Madame Norman-Néruda, Signor Piatti, and Mr. Hallé played Beethoven's magnificent triple concerto in a manner worthy of the work, and Madame Néruda and Signor Piatti each gave solos in their respectively unique styles. Miss Mary Davies replaced as vocalist Madame Patey, who was indisposed.—On the 20th ult., Cherubini's Requiem, in C minor, was given for the first time here. The performance was good, but the work, though delightful to study, and replete with the contrapuntal and fugal devices of which Cherubini was so great a master, failed to produce much effect. Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was also performed, both orchestra and choir being thoroughly satisfactory, Miss Mary Davies achieving more than her wonted success in the soprano music. Mr. Sims Reeves was unable to appear, but Mr. Frank Boyle, who undertook the tenor music at short notice, created a favourable impression.

MODBURY.—A very successful Concert by the members of the Church Choir and other local and professional talent, was given in the Assembly Rooms on Thursday evening, the 13th ult. The programme consisted largely of instrumental music, a feature of the evening being the pianoforte solos by Miss Dinah Shapley, R.A.M. (Lady Goldsmid scholar, Bennett prize-holder, and bronze and silver medalist), in an artistic manner. Mr. J. Pardew's violin solo was, as usual, an excellent performance. Mr. W. H. D. Andrews, the Misses Andrews, Miss Shephard, Mr. J. Crocker, and the Rev. G. C. Green were the vocalists. The programme also included selections by Miss Gertrude Green, Mr. A. Davis, Mr. W. Shephard, and Mr. T. Shephard. The choruses were very creditably executed.

NEWBURY.—The members of the Amateur Orchestral Union gave two Concerts in the Town Hall, on Tuesday, the 11th ult., in aid of the Newbury Volunteer Fire Brigade. The Concerts were well attended, and the result both in a musical and financial point of view most gratifying to all concerned. The programme was well selected, and the whole of the members did justice to their respective parts. The solo vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkom, Miss Jeanie Rosse, and the Rev. C. A. Treherne. Mr. W. D. Eatwell conducted.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—A performance of Mr. Prout's Cantata, Hereward, was given by Mr. Rea's choir on the 18th ult. Miss Anna Williams, Miss Tomlinson, Mr. Kearton, and Mr. Bridson were the soloists. The choir and band were alike excellent, and the rendering of the work was highly creditable to all concerned.

NORTH BERWICK, N.B.—On Christmas Eve a special service was held in St. Baldred's Church, when a Christmas Cantata by Frank Bates, Mus. Bac., Organist and Choirmaster of the church, was sung. On Christmas Day Mr. Bates was presented with a box containing £20 from the Incumbent and principal members of the congregation, and two very handsome books from the choir boys.

NORWICH.—A Concert, which may now be looked upon as an annual one, was given in Noverre's Rooms on Wednesday evening, the 5th ult., by the choristers, assisted by the lay clerks, of Norwich Cathedral. The first part comprised the late Mr. Henry Smart's Cantata for treble voices, entitled King René's Daughter, the solo parts being well sustained by Masters Hardesty, Smith, and Bales respectively. The second part of the Concert commenced with Romberg's Toy Symphony, played by Messrs. Meers and Flowers, and the choristers, under the direction of Dr. Gladstone. The programme also contained a very characteristic carol by Dr. Steggall, entitled "New Prince, new pomp"; an excellent glee, "When twilight dews," by Mr. Fred. C. Atkinson, Mus. Bac. (an old chorister of Norwich Cathedral); and Cooke's fine five-part glee, "Hohenlinden," which was a great treat, not only on account of its musical worth, but also for its good performance by Messrs. Holden, Brookes, Thouless, Smith, and Brockbank. Dr. Gladstone's work, as Choirmaster, Organist, and teacher has been so thoroughly earnest and skilful, that the successful result on the present occasion but served to testify that his departure will be a real loss to Norwich Cathedral.

NOTTINGHAM.—At the commencement of the present season Mr. Henry Farmer resigned the post of Conductor to the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society, which he had filled for fourteen years. The committee and members, in order to show their appreciation of his services, subscribed for a handsome illuminated address, made up in the form of a book. The upper cover was of polished coromandel wood, with Mr. Farmer's initials engraved on a gold shield in the centre. The address was engrossed on vellum, and was illuminated in an exquisite manner by Mr. Collinson, of Nottingham. Recently the President of the Society (H. Liepmann, Esq.), the Secretary (Mr. P. H. Stevenson), and several members of the committee waited upon Mr. Farmer and presented him with the address, which runs as follows: "To Hy. Farmer, Esq. On behalf of the members of the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society we wish to express our deep sorrow and regret that the state of your health has compelled you to resign the position of Conductor which, for fourteen years, you have filled with such signal ability and success; we feel how greatly we are indebted to you, not only for the skill and courtesy with which you have directed our practices and performances, but also for very valuable assistance rendered to the Society in other ways, and although your official connection with us has now come to a close, we venture to hope that we may still retain the advantage of your advice and support. Permit us to add that it is the sincere and heartfelt desire of all of us that your health may very speedily be restored, and that many years of continued happiness may yet be before you." The Secretary having read the address, Mr. Farmer responded, thanking very heartily the committee and members for their gift, which he and his family would value very highly. Especially was he pleased with the unostentatious way in which the presentation was made, and he assured the gentlemen present that, although no longer taking an active part in the management of the Society, he should as long as he lived do all he could to promote its best interests.

ORPINGTON.—Handel's Messiah was performed, for the first time with orchestral accompaniments at Orpington, by the Crays and Orpington Choral Society, on Tuesday, December 21, with great success. The solo vocalists were Miss Muriel Wood, Miss Edith Denbigh, Mr. Oldroyd (of Rochester Cathedral), and Mr. A. D'Oyly. The singing of the choir was excellent, all the choruses being rendered with much vigour and steadiness, reflecting great credit both upon the singers and the Conductor, Mr. J. A. Doyle. The orchestra was highly efficient, Mr. R. Bath proving an able leader.

PEMBERTON, NEAR WIGAN.—Mr. James Gaskell gave his annual Concert, at the Mechanics' Institution, on Tuesday evening, the 18th ult. The vocalists were Miss Laura Smart and Mr. Edward Crompton (both of whom were highly successful), and the instrumentalists Mr. Crompton, sen., Mr. Battersby, Mr. John Crompton, Mr. Edward Crompton, and Miss Lucy Crompton. Hummel's Trio in F was well played by Mr. Crompton, Mr. Edward Crompton, and Miss Crompton; as was also Pleyel's String Quartet, Op. 9, No. 1; and Haydn's, Op. 12, No. 1, in G, by Messrs. Crompton and Mr. Battersby. Mayser's admired Solo, dedicated to Paganini, was admirably performed by Mr. Crompton, sen., and Mr. Gaskell accompanied the songs with much ability and care. The Concert was in every respect thoroughly successful.

POOLE.—An evening Concert was given by Miss Ada Blanchard, R.A.M., in aid of the fund for the proposed east window for the parish church of St. James's, at the Assembly Room on Tuesday, the 4th ult. Miss Blanchard was assisted by Mrs. Irene Ware, R.A.M., Mr. F. W. W. Bamfylde, R.A.M., and others. Mrs. Ware was especially successful in her rendering of a new song by Mr. Ernest Ford, entitled "Good Night," which was encored. Miss Blanchard gave two pianoforte solos, Impromptu in A flat by F. Schubert, and "Allegro con brio" (Sonata Op. 13) by Hummel, which were most cordially received, and also contributed two songs with much effect. A feature of the evening was the performance by Mr. Bamfylde, on the pianoforte, of Liszt's "Fantasia au Rigoletto" and Chopin's "Fantasia Impromptu," both of which were received with much applause. A grand pianoforte, by Broadwood, was kindly lent by Mr. Price, of Bournemouth, and the Assembly Room was also lent for the occasion by Mr. Henry Curtis.

PRESTON.—As last year, the performance of the Messiah by the Preston Choral Society, on Christmas Eve took place in the Guildhall, the whole of the seats being occupied except a few in the first ranks of the reserved section. The orchestra was, as on former occasions, composed chiefly of members of Mr. Charles Hallé's band, and the Conductor, Signor Risegari. The principal vocalists were Miss Kate Hardy, Madame Mary Cummings, Mr. William Shakespeare, and Mr. Henry Cross. Miss Hardy in "I know that my Redeemer liveth," Madame Cummings in "Oh, thou that tellest" and "He was despised," and Mr. Shakespeare in "Thou shalt break them," were highly effective, and elicited warm applause. The whole of the choruses were sung with much energy and precision.

REDRUTH.—On Tuesday, the 11th ult., Mr. T. J. Thuell gave his benefit Concert in the Druids' Hall, the principal artists being Miss May Bell, Miss Marion McReggie, and Mr. Edwin A. Uglov, assisted by several amateurs; all the vocal solos were warmly applauded, and several were redemanded. The well-known Hungarian Dances, given as a pianoforte duet by Mr. Thuell and Mr. W. H. Lanyon, was one of the successes of the evening. The room was crowded, and Mr. Thuell, as well as conducting, occupied his usual post as accompanist.

RETFORD.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert of the season on Thursday, December 23, when Mendelssohn's Athalie was performed. Mr. F. T. Clark recited the dramatic portions, and the soloists were Miss Jenkinson, Miss Birkett, Miss Cross, and Miss Batley. Mr. Hamilton White conducted. In the second part, Miss Denman gave a brilliant rendering of Beethoven's Polonaise in C, and was encored. Mr. Spence sang with taste "Love in her eyes" (Acis and Galatea), and Mr. Denman "Peter, the hermit," the chorus added and arranged by the Conductor. Miss Jenkinson gave an expressive delivery of Gounod's "Ave Maria," the subdued accompaniment for chorus, organ, and piano being received with much enthusiasm.

ROCHDALE.—On Wednesday, the 12th ult., the second Subscription Concert took place in the Town Hall, before a large audience. The instrumentalists were Madame Norman-Neruda, Mr. Chas. Hallé, and his band. The vocalist was Mr. Arthur Oswald. On Friday evening, the 21st ult., the third and last Subscription Concert took place in the Town Hall. The vocalists were Madame Trebelli, Miss Anna Williams, and Signori Vizzani and Zolobi, the instrumentalists being Signor Bisaccia and M. Vanni Musin.

SILONDALDE, NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.—The Silondale Choral Society gave an excellent performance of the Messiah in the Primitive Methodist Chapel on Monday evening, the 17th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss R. Green, Mrs. T. Taylor, Miss Vyjars, Mr. Whiston, and Mr. Pountney. Mr. R. Sourbites played the trumpet obligato, and Dr. W. T. Belcher, of Birmingham, presided at the organ. Mr. F. Mountford was the Conductor.

SOUTHPORT.—On the 19th ult. Mr. A. E. Bartle gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Winter Gardens, at which he played Beethoven's Sonata in C, a Polonaise, Nocturne, and Valse by Chopin, two of Schumann's Novelletten, two of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," a "Paraphrase de Concert" on Rigoletto by Liszt, and the Scherzo movement from Litolff's Fifth Concerto. On the 22nd ult., Miss Nellie Arthur and Miss Mathilde Lemon sang at the Winter Gardens' Popular Concert, at which also Mr. J. T. Carodus played a couple of violin solos. The Carl Rosa Opera Company opened a short stay of three nights at the Pavilion Theatre on the 24th ult. with Mignon, in which Miss Georgina Burns as Filina and Miss Julia Gaylord in the title rôle, were very successful. Mr. J. W. Turner was the Wilhelm, and the other parts were filled by Miss Josephine Yorke, Mr. Leslie Crotty, and Mr. Charles Lyall. On the 25th, the Bohemian Girl was produced, with Miss Clara Perry as Arline; and on the 26th Carmen was performed.

STRAFORD-ON-AVON.—Mendelssohn's Athalie was performed by the Choral Society on the 18th ult., and although the inclement state of the weather prevented the attendance of many of the members (and reduced the audience to a somewhat scanty assembly), the work was very efficiently rendered. The solo parts were most creditably rendered by Miss McLandsborough, Mrs. Cranmer, and Miss Stuart, the lyrics being recited by Mr. Charles Fry. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, and included, among other pieces, a very effective part-song by Mr. Caseley, entitled "The Dream." Four were contributed by Miss McLandsborough and Miss Stuart, and Mr. Charles Fry recited scenes from the School for Scandal and Hamlet, in the latter of which, especially, he was warmly applauded. The accompaniments on the pianoforte were efficiently played by Mr. Mariés; and Mr. Caseley, who conducted the performance with much care, joined Mr. Mariés at the harmonium in the Overture and War March in Athalie.

TORONTO.—There were special Musical Services at the Cathedral Church of St. James's both on Christmas morning and Sunday afternoon and evening. An excellent programme of music was given by Mr. Doward, the Organist, and a choir of sixty voices, which was admirably rendered. Mrs. Cuthbert was the soprano soloist, and sang with her accustomed ability the four recitatives from the Messiah, commencing with "There were shepherds." The choir sang "Hark, the herald angels sing," "For unto us a Child is born," and "Glory to God in the highest," from the Messiah, and Mendelssohn's Kyrie and Gloria. These excerpts were finely given, and with a degree of finish that indicated careful rehearsal. Mr. Doward played Handel's Pastoral Symphony, Lemmens's Allegretto in B flat, as the offertory voluntary, and Beethoven's Adagio from the Septet, as the concluding voluntary, all of which were performed in his usual artistic manner. At the service on the following morning, the Dean preached on the martyrdom of St. Stephen and the institution of the order of deacons. The choir was not so large as before, but a good musical selection was, nevertheless given. Mrs. Davis was the solo vocalist, and sang very effectively "Behold a virgin," and "O thou that tellest." The organ solos were the Andante from Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto, Guilman's Offertoire in D, and Hesse's Prelude and Fugue. In the evening the Rev. Mr. Rainsford preached to a large congregation. The solo vocalist was Miss White and the Romanza from Mozart's second Concerto was the principal organ number. On New Year's Day the members of the choir of St. James's Cathedral presented Mr. Doward with a purse of money, and an address expressive of their appreciation of his merits as a musician and his kindness and courtesy in the capacity of their instructor.

TOTNES.—A very successful Concert, under the direction of Miss Dinah Shapley, R.A.M., was given at the Assembly Rooms, Seymour Hotel, on Friday evening, the 14th ult. The vocalists were Miss Berrie Stephens, the Misses Hicks, and the Rev. W. Watkins. Miss Shapley proved herself a thorough artist in her pianoforte solos, and also displayed a well-trained voice in Cowen's song "The Better Land." Mr. T. B. Knott contributed an effective pianoforte solo "Troisième Ballade in A flat" (Chopin). A vocal trio, "Ave Maria" (Dinah M. Shapley), was effectively rendered by Miss Berrie Stephens, Miss M. Hicks, and Miss Gertrude Hicks.

TWICKENHAM.—The Concert given by the Strawberry Hill Choral Society at the Town Hall, on the 21st December, was in every respect a marked success, a great portion of which was unquestionably due to the interest taken in this recently formed Society by Mr. Joseph Barnby, who has most zealously directed its practices, and on this occasion conducted the performance. The first part of the programme was devoted to Sir Sterndale Bennett's Cantata, The May Queen, the principal vocalists in which were Miss Clark, Miss Dixon, Mr. Cox, and Mr. E. Curtis, all of whom were highly efficient. The choruses were steadily and effectively given throughout, and the work was most cordially received by the audience. The second part was miscellaneous, and contained in addition to several vocal pieces and a pianoforte solo by Madame Frickenhaus, Pearsall's "O, who will o'er the downs so free," and "In dulci jubilo." Sullivan's "O hush thee, my babe," Schumann's "Gipsy life," and Eaton Fanning's "Song of the Vikings," all of which were excellently sung by the choir.

WELSHPOOL.—A successful Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms on Friday, the 7th ult., by the Welshpool Harmonic Society. Handel's Messiah was the work performed, with an efficient band under the leadership of Mr. C. E. Newman, and the choir augmented by members of the Shrewsbury Harmonic Society. The soloists were Miss E. H. Lloyd, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. W. Anstice, and Mr. H. L. Howell. Miss Hilda Wilson's charming rendering of "He was despised" created a deep impression. The whole of the choral numbers, under the skilful conducting of Mr. J. W. Godsell, went splendidly. Miss Helen Porteous was the pianist.

WESTON, STAFFORDSHIRE.—A grand amateur Concert was given at the Weston School-room on Monday, the 24th ult., by the members of the Ingestre Choral Society. The programme consisted of Gade's Cantata, Comala, and "Spring," from Haydn's Seasons. In the former work, the part of Comala was undertaken by Mrs. James Gardner, that of Dersagrena by Mrs. Gordon, Melicoma, by Miss Birch, and Fingal by the Rev. C. Gordon. The performance was an excellent one throughout, and the final chorus given with great breadth and spirit. In Spring the solos were allotted to the Rev. C. and Mrs. Gordon, and Mr. Roper, and the performance highly creditable to all concerned. The accompaniments were rendered on the pianoforte with taste and finish by a young lady amateur, and Mr. S. S. Stratton conducted. Owing to the severity of the weather, the audience was not so large as the interesting character of the Concert merited, but was both appreciative and enthusiastic.

WIMBLEDON.—A Concert of sacred and secular music was given at the Drill Hall on Tuesday, the 4th ult. The vocalists were Miss Maud Longhurst, Miss M. Galer, Madame Edwyn Frith, Mr. W. E. Glazier, and Mr. Edwyn Frith; Mdlle. Hélène De Lisle (solo violin), Mr. Arthur L'Estrange (solo pianoforte).

WORCESTER.—On the 24th ult. Mr. E. J. Spark was presented with a handsomely framed illuminated address from former vicars and old members of the choir of Holy Trinity Church, in recognition of his services as Organist and Choirmaster for a period of fifteen years. A Concert, given on the evening of the 24th ult., at the Music Hall, on behalf of the parish of St. Andrew, was well attended, and an attractive programme was gone through, much to the satisfaction of the audience.

WORKSOP.—On Tuesday, December 21, the members of the Choral Society gave their first Concert of the season. The first part consisted of Mendelssohn's Athalie, the dramatic portions being ably declaimed by Mr. F. T. Clark. The soloists were the Misses Jenkinson, Rissmann, Hardcastle, and Cross. The choruses were given with precision and delicacy of expression, the accompaniments being arranged for piano and harmonium by the Conductor, Mr. Hamilton White. The overture and march were played as a piano duet by Mr. F. W. Wells and Miss Denman, and Mr. G. F. Ashley presided at the harmonium. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection, the most noticeable features being the singing of "May no rash intruder" (Handel), and the "Hallelujah," Mount of Olives (Beethoven); the trio, "O Memory" (Leslie), by Mrs. Wilson, Miss Hardcastle, and Mr. Pogson; and the "Ave Maria," soprano solo, with chorus, organ, and violin (Gounod), by Miss Jenkinson. Mr. Malander gave an excellent rendering of the song "Honour and arms" (Handel), and Fraulein Rissmann of Schubert's "Ungeud." The room was crowded to excess.

YEOVIL.—A Concert was given by Mr. Harry A. Bullock, Organist of the parish church, at the Town Hall, on Wednesday, December 22. The artists were: Vocalists, Miss Ellen Horne, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Bernard Lane, Mr. Farley Sinkins; solo pianoforte, Mdlle. Randegger; solo violoncello, Mons. Albert.

YORK.—An excellent performance of Handel's Messiah was given by the members of the Choral Society, on Tuesday, December 21. The band and chorus numbered over 200, and the solo vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Wakefield, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Shepley. Mr. R. S. Burton was, as usual, Conductor.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Edgar P. Lavington, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Cirencester.—Mr. John Bottomley, Organist and Choirmaster to Christ Church, Leamington.—Mr. H. F. Dunand, Organist and Choirmaster to Bletchingley Parish Church.—Mr. W. J. Dunand, to the Parish Church, Camden Town.—Mr. Ben. Charlwood, to the Parish Church, Reigate.—Mr. E. Davidson Palmer, Mus. NOVELLO, EWER & CO.'S

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

"Dr. Grove's Dictionary will be a boon to every intelligent lover of music."—Saturday Review.

"What is modestly called a 'Dictionary' might have fairly been entitled an 'Encyclopædia' for the editor has included in his scheme everything that belongs to music, or is allied, or is even distantly related to it. It would be a great mistake to regard this work as useful only for the purposes of reference. It is a collection of interesting and valuable articles on all kinds of musical subjects, which amateurs, who take a genuine interest in the art they profess to love, will read from beginning to end."—Daily News.

"We now take leave of this 'Dictionary' recommending it heartily to our readers as full of instruction and amusement."—Times.

"What will strike the reader first of all, perhaps, is the fulness and completeness of the information here collected."—Examiner.

TO PROFESSORS of the PIANOFORTE.—

Messrs. Duff and Stewart beg to call the attention of the profession to the "Hanover Edition" of Standard and Popular Works for the Pianoforte. This edition has been thoroughly revised, fingered, and re-engraved, so as to avoid the introduction of half-sheets (always objectionable). It is printed on the best paper, and the correctness, uniformity, and style of production, encourage the Publishers to believe that the "Hanover Edition" will be preferred to any other. Full particulars as to terms, and specimen copy sent, on receipt of six stamps.

HOW TO LEARN TO PLAY THE PIANO

WELL. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.

"To both moderate and indifferent players this little manual is worth its weight in gold." "We commend this little book to those who wish to play well." "Here, in the compass of fourteen pages, is matter calculated to produce better results than half-a-dozen years' teaching."
"Our author says 'method' is everything in practising; we cordially recommend his method to those who wish to know the secret of playing well." "Shows clearly the way to success in pianoforte-playing." "From henceforth there ought to be no excuse for the 'sloppy' kind of playing to which we are too much accustomed."

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

Price 1s.

THE ART OF PLAYING AT SIGHT. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF."Considering the number of persons who are taught to play the piano, it is astonishing how few can 'read' music. The author attributes this to the fact that no system is put forth by teachers. The method advocated in this little book is a novel one, and will undoubtedly produce success if persevered in.""The author believes his system to be infallible; after a fair trial, we must say we believe so too."

tion in saying that I consider it most exhaustive and useful."—Charles Hallé. "I have read your work on 'Finger Gymnastics' with great pleasure. It is not only interesting in itself, but is likely to be of great benefit to all students of the pianoforte."—Brintley Richards.
"Several of my pupils have tried a few of them at my request, and think they have already derived benefit from their use."—Arthur O'Leary. "I consider it invaluable to any one studying the violin or any other instrument requiring flexibility of the fingers."—Guido Papini. "Some very excellent directions are given with illustrations.
... We really believe that much benefit may be derived from following implicitly the rules laid down."—Musical Times. "... well calculated to produce that suppleness of wrist and elasticity of touch without which no good results can ever be obtained on the piano.

JACK AND THE BEANSTALK

A COMIC CANTATA

COMPOSED BY

EDMUND ROGERS

Three Shillings net.

“The Cantata is a very good thing in its way, and will, if we mistake not, have a wide acceptance. Four solo voices (S.A.T.B.) and chorus are called into requisition for its performance; and the music, although written in a humorous spirit, is never coarse. On the other hand it is tuneful, never flags for a moment, and is composed throughout with the ease and fluency of an accustomed hand.”—The Queen.
Special terms to Choral Societies on application to the Composer, 4, Melrose Gardens, West Kensington Park, W.

GRAND PIANOFORTES „ 200 „ 300 „

The use of the Chickering Pianos by the greatest Pianists, Art Critics, and Amateurs, has given to these instruments an universal prestige and reputation far above all other Pianos manufactured in America or Europe. The verdict of the very highest art talent, including Dr. Franz Liszt, Louis Plaidy, Stephen Heller, Carl Reinecke, Marmontel, Arabella Goddard, &c., &c., places the Chickering Pianos of to-day at the head of the entire list of Pianos made in the world, proving them

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.

THE CHICKERING PIANOS WERE AWARDED THE

FIRST GRAND GOLD MEDAL OF HONOUR

AT THE PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1867, AND WERE GIVEN

The still HIGHER AWARD far beyond all Medals, conferred only upon CHICKERING & SONS, to the exclusion of Four Hundred other competitors, viz. :—

PIANOFORTE, HARMONIUM, & ORGAN LAMP

PRICE 10s. 6d.

PRICE 10s. 6d.

TESTIMONIAL

FROM

BERTHOLD TOURS, Esq.

“Your Lamp is a most ingenious contrivance, and only requires to be known to be universally adopted.”

TESTIMONIAL

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, Esq.

“I have great pleasure in speaking of my experience of the admirable manner in which your Pianoforte Lamp illuminates the music; it is by far the best thing of the kind so far as I know.”

REGISTERED.

“A very ingenious application of lamp-light to the desk of the pianoforte, harmonium, or organ has been registered by Mr. Thomas Ward. The lamp is so contrived, that it may be screwed on to any instrument, in a central position, so as to throw the full force of the light direct upon the music, the present system of side lights causing a waste of a great part of the illuminating power.”—Illustrated London News.

MR. J. HAMILTON,
6, CHESTERTON TERRACE, CITY ROAD,

MANUFACTURER OF

Pedals and Action for Pianofortes,

Begs to inform Organists, Organ Students, and others that his invention for attaching PEDALS to PIANOFORTES is so useful that it has earned the approbation of over a thousand members of the musical profession. For a small outlay the great pleasure of playing organ music (from Bach's Grand Fugues to the late Henry Smart's beautiful movements) at home can be obtained. This action is easily attached to any kind of Pianoforte in a short time, as it is all sent complete with printed instructions "How to attach."

A Set of Straight Pedals (CC to F, 30 notes), with action and printed instructions, price £4 4s.

TESTIMONIAL.

Brinscall, near Chorley, February 4, 1881.

Sir,—I received the pedals and action yesterday, and have got it attached to my pianoforte. I must say that its utility and usefulness exceed all my expectations, it is perfectly noiseless and just what every organist or any one wishing for pedal practice at home ought to have. I should have had a set of your pedals years ago had I known they acted so well.—I remain, yours most truly,

J. AINSWORTH, Professor of Music.

To Mr. J. HAMILTON.

Agents are required for every town and district.

Send for prices to the profession and trade; also for testimonials. Orders accompanied with cheque or P.O. order will receive immediate attention.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

LOCAL EXAMINATIONS IN ELEMENTARY MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

ESTABLISHED 1876.

Local Centres, under the care of Honorary Local Secretaries, have been established throughout the United Kingdom and the British Colonies.

The next Local Examinations in Elementary Musical Knowledge will take place on FRIDAY, June 17, 1881, and will be open to persons of either sex.

National Prizes of the values of £5 and £3 will be open to Candidates in each Division, Senior and Junior. The Examiners are also prepared to undertake the adjudication of certain Local Prizes.

The entrance-fee for every Candidate not connected with an Institution enrolled in union with the College is Five Shillings. The entrance-fee for every Candidate connected with an Institution in union is One Shilling. Honorary Members of the College who may be officially connected with an Institution can obtain the enrolment of such Institution in union without fee.

The Local Examinations are conducted as follows: The Examination Papers, inclosed in a sealed packet, are opened by the Local Secretary in the presence of the Candidates, and, at the close of the Examination, the work of the Candidates is placed in a cover, sealed up in their presence, and sent the same day to the Registrar of the College.

The Examinations are conducted in two divisions, Senior and Junior. The Examination Paper in the Senior Division is devoted to Elementary Theory, with a few historical questions. The Examination Paper in the Junior Division is limited to questions in notation, time, clefs, signatures, scales, terms, &c., and (in the Honours Section only) one or two easy historical questions will be set. Candidates may take their choice of entering for the Senior or Junior Division without consideration of age. Candidates born before the 17th of June, 1864, are not eligible for Prizes or other Honours in the Junior Division, but they may obtain the ordinary certificates with "special mention."

Candidates must send in their names (in full), with the entrance-fees, to the Local Secretary for the District not later than May 7, 1881.

The Regulations may be had of the Secretary, Trinity College, London, W.

MARCH 1, 1881.

MR. STANFORD'S OPERA,

"THE VEILED PROPHET OF KHORASSAN."

AMONG all the interesting and important works which have lately been produced at the Hoftheater at Hanover, no one has been looked forward to with more interest or received with greater enthusiasm than the opera, "The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan," by C. Villiers Stanford, performed for the first time at the above theatre on the 6th ult.; and surely no one has a better claim to the attention of Englishmen, having been originally written to an English libretto by one of the most prominent of the younger school of English composers. Mr. Stanford's name is well known in the musical world, and although his fame rests perhaps as much on the excellence of the performances given under his direction at Cambridge as upon his compositions, yet such of the latter as have been heard in London—as, for instance, those that have been given at the Crystal Palace and at the Richter Concerts—have aroused the attention of the discerning part of the musical public, and by them his career as a composer is watched with ever-increasing interest. Now, however, he has come before the world in a new light, as the composer of a grand opera, a work of greater importance than has hitherto appeared from his pen.

In his choice of a subject, Mr. Stanford, actuated probably by national sympathy for the poet, for he is a fellow-countryman of Thomas Moore's, has been especially fortunate. "Lalla Rookh" has already yielded much excellent material for musical treatment—witness Spontini's "Nourmahal," Félicien David's "Lalla Rookh," Rubinstein's "Feramors," and last, but not least, Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri"; but it is remarkable that the story which, of all the episodal poems in that work, exhibits the greatest possibilities for dramatic treatment should have been hitherto almost entirely overlooked. Schumann, it is true, had intended to set it as an opera, but his purpose was never fulfilled, and the only evidence of its existence is in a letter written by him to Zuccalmaglio. The story of "The Veiled Prophet" has furthermore the advantage of being historically true. In D'Herbelot's "Dictionnaire Orientale" a description is given of the personage who gives his name to the poem, of which the following is an extract: "Mocanna, surnom de Hakem, fils de Haschem, fameux imposteur dans Khorassan, sous le règne du Khalife Mahadi. Il reçut dans les combats qu'il donna un coup de flèche qui lui fit perdre un œil, ce qui l'obligea pour cacher cette difformité de porter un voile ou un masque que l'on nomme en Arabe burcâ, ce que luy fit donner le surnom de Burcâi. Cet imposteur, quoyqu'il fût d'ailleurs fort malfait de sa personne, voulut cependant par une ténacité incroyable passer pour un Dieu, et eut plusieurs sectateurs qu'il abusa, et qui lui servirent à se rendre maître de quelques places fortes dans le Mavarannahar, autour des villes de Nekscheb et de Kasche; de sorte que, s'étant rendu déjà puissant, et la faction croissant de jour en jour, le Khalife Mahadi fût obligé d'envoyer une armée pour en arrêter les progrès et pour châtier cet imposteur. . . . Après une longue défense se voyant réduit à l'extrémité, il prit le party de se faire mourir luy et tous les siens, par une invention fort nouvelle. Pour venir à bout de son dessein, il donna du poison dans le vin à tous les gens, et se jettâ luy-même ensuite dans une cuve pleine de drogues brûlantes et consumantes afin qu'il ne restât rien de tous les membres de son corps, et que ceux qui resteroient de sa secte pussent croire qu'il était monté au ciel, ce que ne manqua pas d'arriver. Ben Schonach dit qu'il montrait une espèce de lune qu'il faisoit lever la nuit quand il vouloit passer pour Dieu." Moore's ending, poetic and touching as it is, is an addition to the story, and as such it has been discarded for one more in accordance with the historical facts and dramatic effect. In other respects, the author of the libretto, Mr. W. Barclay Squire, has made use of Moore's version of the story, and adhered to it almost entirely. It will be remembered that in Moore the story is related in three divisions or narrations; these form the three acts into which the opera is divided. A short description of the action and the most prominent features of the music as connected with it may not be unwelcome. The curtain rises on a hall of state in the Palace of Merou. A throne is set in the middle, and round it is grouped a band of neophytes, who have abjured the service of the Caliph for that of the mystic Prophet Mocanna, whose coming they await with expectant excitement. After a short chorus for male voices, the first notes of a march are heard in the distance, and soon the procession of the Prophet appears, at the end of which he himself enters, clad in a long white garment, his face being covered with a glistening and semi-transparent veil, which allows only the general outline of his head to be seen. He takes his seat on the throne, and at the conclusion of the chorus an impressive phrase of three bars is given out on the low strings and the wood wind, which phrase is afterwards inseparably connected with the Prophet's appearance. Mocanna rises and addresses his followers, enjoining on them strict obedience and absolute devotion to him and to his cause, which he declares to be the freedom of the world. They are to be ultimately rewarded by the revelation of his countenance, which he describes as being of the most perfect beauty and brilliancy, inasmuch that it is necessary to veil it from all human eyes. The music to which these words are set is of great beauty, and its principal subject is used as a motif for the veiled countenance of Mocanna; the entire solo is most effective and well calculated for the voice (a true baritone). The Prophet's speech is interrupted by the entrance of Abdullah, his confidential slave, who rushes in breathless, and describes in terrified accents how he has seen the Caliph's army drawn up in battle array outside the city. Mocanna takes this opportunity of testing his followers' devotion, and despatches Abdullah to bring in Azim, a young warrior of invincible might, also a newly arrived proselyte to the cause, who enters fully armed. After a few bars of recitative, begins a trio for Azim, Mocanna, and Abdullah (tenor, baritone, and bass), with the chorus; the whole ensemble, in which Azim is invested with the leadership of Mocanna's troops, is one of the finest numbers in the opera.

The scene is now changed to a room in the palace, with a lattice-window looking down into the street below. The martial strains of the first scene are heard on the stage, and Zelica, the virgin priestess, is discovered watching the troops go past the window. She descries Azim in the procession and utters a shriek; after a few bars, during which she has only strength to falter his name, old remembrances of their early love come flooding in upon her, and she describes how Azim was carried away to the war and how news afterwards came of his death. This solo, one of the most pathetic and original in the work, is interrupted by the Prophet, who comes to induce her to join in a plan for assuring Azim's allegiance to the cause by means of the fascinating allurements and enchantments of the harem; in this scheme she is to be the central figure. Amazed at the contrast between the Prophet's former professions and his present commands, she refuses with indignation, but is reminded of the terrific oath by which she has been bound to him for ever, and is compelled to consent to his demands, which are accompanied by a promise that she shall see his face. This he ends by showing her, lifting his veil with his back turned to the audience, and she, uttering a scream of horror, falls fainting to the ground. The whole of this act, as will be seen, abounds in powerful dramatic situations, of which the best advantage is taken by both librettist and composer.

In striking contrast to this is the second act, the greater part of which is purely lyrical. The scene is in a garden in the harem. It is evening, and groups of women are seen wreathing garlands, preparing for Azim's arrival. The opening number is a chorus, with a solo sung by Fatima, the chief slave of the harem, after which the women leave the stage, hearing footsteps approaching. Abdullah comes in leading Azim, who has been blindfolded. The scarf is taken off by Abdullah, who then sings a song in which Mocanna is compared to a fowler, his prey being the women whose voices have just been heard. Azim, whose faith in the Prophet is unshaken, drives out the ribald slave, and when left alone, having searched the garden in vain for any traces of his long-lost Zelica, he gives up the quest as hopeless, and in an aria of great beauty calls on death to relieve him from his despair. He casts himself upon a couch, and the voices of the women are heard again, this time behind the scenes, singing an invocation to the Spirit of Love, in words built upon those of Moore, whose arrangement at this point is closely followed, being peculiarly well adapted for stage representation. This chorus is followed by a ballet, between the two divisions of which the dancers bring in Fatima, who sings the well-known verses beginning "There's a bower of roses by Bendemeer's stream," to an air of peculiar charm, built on a scale of oriental character. At the conclusion of the whole ballet, a figure enters among the dancers, enveloped in a white veil, similar to those worn by the dancers themselves, which, when left alone, she lifts, and shows herself to be Zelica. Azim springs up in astonishment, unable to believe that it is his long and eagerly sought love. She stands motionless and silent, until Azim charges her to tell whether she is really Zelica, when she confesses that they have both been duped by Mocanna. Azim urges her to fly from the monster's presence, which she refuses to do, being reminded again of her oath by the mystic influence of Mocanna, who at that moment crosses the stage at the back unseen by the lovers; she entreats him to leave her, but he declares that he will live or die with her. They resolve on flight, and are on the point of departure, when they are interrupted by the Prophet, who rushes in to prevent them. Azim draws his dagger and attacks Mocanna; but his weapon breaks against the concealed armour of the Prophet, who utters a derisive peal of devilish laughter as Azim leaves the stage vowing vengeance.

In point of musical treatment this act is, perhaps, the most elaborate in the work; in fact, it may be said that the first portion of the act, which is, as respects dramatic action, the slightest in the whole opera, is somewhat overweighted by the importance of the music. Of course the love duet between Azim and Zelica is the climax both of the action and the music, and as such it stands out from the rest of the act with due prominence; but it fails in some degree of its full effect, owing to the interesting numbers that have preceded it. Among these may be mentioned, as being of especial importance, Abdullah's song, with its Mozart-like sweetness and gaiety; Azim's aria; the whole of the ballet music, with its peculiar oriental rhythms and character; and Fatima's song. The ensemble of the duet is exceedingly effective and well-written, and the canonic imitation in the middle section is a striking evidence of the possibility of combining passionate dramatic action with theoretic skill.

The scene of the third act, which takes place at night, is laid in the courtyard of the palace. On one side of the stage is the palace itself, with steps leading up to it; in the background is a pool or well, surrounded with tall palm-trees; and opposite the palace a part of the city wall is seen, with its battlements and towers. On this wall a Watchman is keeping guard, and beguiling the time with a love-song of a very original character, in which the oriental character is again prominent, and during which the trumpets of the Caliph are heard breaking in upon the silence of the night. As he goes away along the wall a group of mailed figures is seen stealing out from behind the palace. They are the proselytes with whom the first act opened, who have now begun to disbelieve in the glory and the promises of Mocanna, and who resolve to return to their allegiance, and to throw themselves on the mercy of the Caliph. Abdullah comes out of the palace, and gives himself to the conspirators, who sing an excited and turbulent chorus, expressing their disbelief in the Prophet and their determination to kill him. At this moment Mocanna himself appears in their midst, and stands before them unarmed, daring them to fulfil their murderous resolve. Overawed by his dignity and the mysterious influence which is inseparable from his personality, they are mute. He then offers, in order to strengthen their expiring faith, to show them a test of his power over heaven and earth, by commanding the moon to rise out of the pool, giving them leave to destroy him if the ordeal does not succeed. He ascends the steps and, amid the tumultuous murmurs among the crowd of his followers, who are joined by the women from the palace, begins with mystic gestures to conjure the moon by the sign of Soliman. For some time nothing breaks the darkness, and the chorus becomes more impatient, when at last a gleam appears among the palms which overshadow the well, and the moon gradually rises in full brilliancy.* The followers, whose unbelief is turned into wonder and repentant admiration, throw themselves at Mocanna's feet, with enthusiastic expressions of devotion. He bids them to a feast, at which he promises to reveal the mystery of his countenance, and they enter the palace leaving him gloating over his approaching vengeance; for he has determined to punish their apostasy by means of poison, and to crown his hellish triumph by showing them his hideous visage as they are expiring. He follows them into the palace, and at the same time Zelica and Fatima enter at the back, prepared to take their flight and to deliver up the city to the Caliph. After a short duet, which serves as a relief to the dramatic intensity of the scenes which precede and follow it, Fatima is despatched to complete the plan of escape which had been previously determined upon. Zelica, when left alone, sings a very touching and beautiful invocation to the night for protection and concealment, which is interrupted by the faintly heard death-groans of the dying followers from the palace. After a pause Mocanna's voice is heard as he lifts the veil and discovers himself to his duped victims. Zelica hastens up the steps and looks into the palace, and then, with a terrified cry, hides herself among the shrubs on the brink of the pool. Mocanna appears on the steps bearing the poisoned cup in his hand, and, on perceiving Zelica, he tries to compel her to join him in the fatal draught. She flings the cup away, calling for deliverance on Azim, who appears at the same moment, led in by Fatima. He draws his sword, rushes on the Prophet, bearing him down, and delivers him to the guards of the Caliph; Mocanna breaks from them, and, standing on the brink of the pool, pours imprecations upon those who had been duped by him, tears the veil from his ghastly countenance, stabs himself, and plunges into the water. During the last scene the Caliph and his troops have been admitted; the day has begun to break, and as the sun bursts out in full splendour, a finale, consisting of a quartet (Zelica, Fatima, Azim, and the Caliph) with chorus, begins, and forms a fitting conclusion to the whole work.

In the third act the interest is well sustained throughout, and the composer is more than equal to the occasion. In particular, the whole of the scene in which the moon is raised is musically conceived, and carried out in a very powerful manner. The orchestral passage representing the gradual ascent of the moon, the solemn and impressive tones in which Mocanna utters his spells, the impatient cries of the people, changing into shouts of wonder and adoration when the first gleam of light is seen upon the water, and last, but not least, the snatches of the Watchman's song heard above the other voices at the moment of the moon's appearance—all these unite to form an ensemble rarely surpassed in dramatic power and musical treatment. Here the composer shows himself a thorough master of the materials at his command. The treatment of soli, chorus, and orchestra is alike excellent. After this elaborate and moving climax relief is wanted. This is provided by the duet and solo which immediately succeed this scene; these serve to prepare for the intensely dramatic duet between Zelica and Mocanna, and for the finale, in which a broad and flowing melody is prominent, being well divided among the voices, and a most effective conclusion.

Mr. Stanford's style as a dramatic composer is all his own. Before hearing this work it might have been expected that traces would be found of that tendency to imitate Wagner which is the besetting sin of most of the younger school of operatic writers. Such, however, is by no means the case. It is true that particular musical phrases are used to represent special leading personages or ideas in the drama, in the manner of Wagner's Leitmotive (if indeed he can rightly be called the inventor of what was employed by many before him); but these phrases are employed in a manner quite different from that of Wagner, being used in a much simpler and less complicated way, and being only introduced for special purposes, and then definitely marked, so that their meaning cannot be mistaken. This is the sole resemblance that can possibly be found in Mr. Stanford's work to Wagner's. For example, his view of the relation between the voices and the orchestra is entirely different from that of the great music-dramatist; the passages and phrases given to the former are never difficult or impossible to sing, or harsh in effect, while the latter is throughout the work kept in the background, pervading and giving colour to the whole, while it never obtrudes itself unduly into notice. On the other hand, the orchestral writing is not the less careful, because it is not always prominent, but in every part of the work it is full of individuality and charm. Mr. Stanford's style of instrumentation, both here and in his other orchestral works, is built more or less on that of Schumann; while his style of dramatic treatment bears more resemblance to Meyerbeer than to that of any other master. With regard to what is technically known as "local colour," i.e., the employment of special peculiarities of rhythm, tonality, or orchestration, in order to bring vividly before the hearer the feeling of the locality or period of the action—Mr. Stanford's method is again purely original. In the case of many works, especially in some of recent date, the local colouring is obtruded and insisted upon throughout, by which means the most important dramatic points are apt to be obscured, and the hearer to be wearied with the persistency and monotony of the characterising elements in the music. Two prominent instances of this may be given—Rubinstein's "Maccabæer" and Bizet's "Carmen." In the one phrases and figures characteristic of Jewish music, and in the other, rhythm and intervals peculiar to Spanish dances, are insisted upon to such a degree that the hearer's pleasure is greatly diminished. Here, however, the case is different. The oriental characteristics, which are very beautiful and of new effect in themselves, are reserved entirely for the lyrical portions of the opera, and in no single scene do they intrude upon the more serious and dramatic sections. Thus, in the second scene of the first act, where Zelica is recounting the story of her early love, they are introduced with a sparing hand, and do not appear again until the second act, where, as has been said above, they are used with greater freedom. In the opening chorus, in both sections of the ballet music, which is of wonderful originality and charm, and in Fatima's song they occur, combined with a wonderful feeling of enchantment and glamour, which is cast over the whole by an entirely new use of orchestral effects. Again, in the third act, the Watchman's love-song, before alluded to, is peculiarly oriental, both in the melody and in the accompaniment, and the distant trumpets heard behind the scenes heighten the effect produced by the employment of local colouring.

With regard to the performance of the work at Hanover, the first meed of praise must be given to the indefatigable director and talented translator of the libretto, Herr Capellmeister Ernst Frank, on whom devolved the whole labour of producing the opera, and whose diligent supervision and masterly powers as a conductor are only equalled by his courage in bringing out this the first dramatic work of its author. It will be remembered that he it is to whom the world owes the production of Hermann Goetz's operas, "The Taming of the Shrew," and "Francesca da Rimini," the latter of which was completed by him from the sketches bequeathed to him by the composer.

The rendering of the part of Zelica by Fräulein Börs was beyond all praise. Possessed of an organ of extraordinary sweetness and purity, combined with an absolutely faultless intonation and great power, this lady is also gifted with an amount of dramatic genius rarely, indeed, to be met with on the lyric stage. Since Mdlle. Tietjens, such a combination of great dramatic power with a voice of such rare excellence has scarcely been seen. Her impersonation of the maiden priestess, under the baneful influence of the Prophet, with the contrasting reminiscences of her old life and of her fatal oath always struggling together in her mind, with her longing for deliverance from the false atmosphere with which she finds herself surrounded: all this was given with marvellous power and pathos. The part of Zelica is one which requires great acting to do it justice, and to awaken the human interest, which, it must be confessed, does not lie on the surface, and which, in almost any other hands, might easily fail to find expression. Herr Schott's Azim was a creation of no less excellence. Gifted, as those of our readers who witnessed his performance of Lohengrin last winter in London will remember, with a superb stage presence, he looked the part to perfection, and sang the music allotted to him most admirably, but the character is not one to excite great interest. The central figure of the opera unfortunately did not find so satisfactory a representative. Doubtless the part of Mocanna is one of no ordinary difficulty, chiefly perhaps because, by the face being covered, all expression is of necessity confined to movements of the figure and limbs; but Herr Nollet, to whom the part was intrusted, although possessed of a powerful voice, has extremely little histrionic ability, and failed utterly in his conception of the character. The parts of Fatima, Abdullah, the Watchman, and the Caliph were admirably filled by Frau Vizthum-Pauli and Herren Bletzacher, Emge, and Von Milde respectively. The chorus was very efficient, and the playing of the orchestra absolute perfection. The whole opera was exceedingly well put upon the stage; the mounting of the second act especially being of unusual beauty. The evolutions of the ballet were extremely graceful, being copied from oriental dances; the dresses were a great relief from the conventional costume, with its hideous contour, being long, almost reaching to the feet, and soft and flowing in outline, with veils which were used with great effectiveness in the dance. These dresses, and indeed those of all the principal characters, were closely copied from Mr. Tenniel's illustrations to "Lalla Rookh."

After the second and third acts, at the first performance, the composer and the chief singers were called repeatedly before the curtain; and at the second performance, on the 11th ult., the ultimate success of the work was assured, the enthusiasm with which it was received being, if possible, still greater than that of the first night.

It is surely a matter for regret that a work of such importance as this should have been first performed in a foreign country, and that, with all our national taste for music, we should be unable as yet to point to an institution where operas of a high class by native composers can be produced. It is to be hoped however that, before long, our countrymen may have an opportunity of witnessing a performance of "The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan" sung in the language to which it was originally composed.

By FRANCIS HUEFFER.

III.

MUSIC, as we have seen, was with Mr. Pepys a matter of sentiment, a passion, but a passion not wholly irrational, not altogether in the clouds, but founded on a sound basis of fact. To facts, as connected with the music of his time, this third Pepysian article shall be devoted; opinions must be left till a later occasion. Not that these latter are, in this particular instance, of no value, or even of less value than the bare record of things existing. On the contrary, Mr. Pepys was a man of great taste and a judicious critic, if ever there was one. There are critics who have acquired a world-wide reputation by being always wrong, by abusing genius before the world had acknowledged it, and by mistaking for giants the pigmies who manage to strut and fret their hour upon the contemporary stage in a cleverly demonstrative manner. Time is the test of opinions, and Mr. Pepys's utterances about the composers of his age have stood that test remarkably well—as we shall see by-and-by. But first of all as to facts. There are in the Diary a number of curious entries referring to the mechanical appliances of the art, the various musical instruments from which our ancestors elicited sweet sounds in the days of the Restoration. To appreciate the historical or practical value of these pieces of information, the present writer knows himself to be peculiarly incompetent. All he can do is to quote the words as they stand for the benefit of Mr. Hipkins, Mr. Carl Engel, and other learned men interested in these matters.

To begin with the king of instruments, the organ: here is a statement relating to the history of its vicissitudes in England. The following extract, dated November 4, 1660, will at the same time illustrate the havoc the Commonwealth had made in the service—musical and otherwise—of the Church:—

"Lord's Day. In the morn to our own church, where Mr. Mills did begin to nibble at the Common Prayer by saying 'Glory be to the Father,' etc., after he had read the two psalms; but the people had been so little used to it that they could not tell what to answer. This declaration of the King's do give the Presbyterians some satisfaction, and a pretence to read the Common Prayer, which they would not do before because of their former preaching against it. After dinner to Westminster, where I went to my Lord's, and having spake with him I went to the Abbey, where the first time that ever I heard the organs in a cathedral."

The explanation of the last sentence is too obvious. The ordinance passed by the Lords and Commons on May 9, 1644, "for the further demolishing of monuments of idolatry and superstition," contains a special paragraph to the effect "that all organs and the frames and cases wherein they stand, in all churches and chapels aforesaid, shall be taken away and utterly defaced, and none others hereafter set up in their places"; and Mr. Hopkins, who reprints the ordinance in his exhaustive article on the "Organ" in Grove's "Dictionary," adds a description of how, "at Westminster Abbey, the soldiers brake down the organs and pawned the pipes at several alehouses for pots of ale."

Immediately after the Restoration a new organ was erected in the Abbey, being, like that in the Chapel Royal—also mentioned by Pepys (July 8, 1660)—the work of Father Smith. It was a small instrument, having cost only £120, and stood on "the north side of the choir." These and other details may be found in that mine of valuable information, "The Organ; its History and Construction," by Mr. Hopkins and Dr. Rimbault. The following facts relating to the instrument on which Purcell played, and which Mr. Pepys heard, are found in the same work. According to one account it was removed from the Abbey in 1730, when the present organ by Schreider and Jordan was built. It was given or sold to the parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and the remains of it, lying for many years in the tower, were disposed of by the churchwardens about forty or fifty years ago. Another account states that it was removed to Vauxhall Gardens, and was the instrument in the orchestra of the Royal Gardens when they ceased to exist.

It seems strange that Mr. Pepys, who was born in 1632 and passed his early youth in or near London, should, as he states in the passage last referred to, not "remember to have heard the organs and singing-men in surplices in my life." The explanation is probably that the boy was a staunch roundhead, although the man conformed to the more congenial tenets of the loyal Church. Mr. Pepys's early republican tendencies troubled him a good deal in later years, and there is an amusing account in the Diary of how he meets a Mr. Christmas, an old schoolfellow, and is much afraid "that he would have remembered the words that I said the day the King was beheaded (that were I to preach upon him my text should be 'The memory of the wicked shall rot'), but I found afterwards that he did go away from school before that time."

After a passing reference to a "pair of Virginals" saved in a boat from the Great Fire of London, we pass to the description of a fearful and wonderful instrument which, with its congeners, the learned men aforesaid must identify. "Thence to the musique meeting at the Post-office where I was once before. And thither anon came all the Gresham College, and a great deal of noble company, and a new instrument was brought called the Arched Viall, where being tuned with lute strings and played on with keys like an organ, a piece of parchment is always kept moving; and the strings which by the keys are pressed down upon it are grated in imitation of a bow by the parchment; and so it is intended to resemble several vyalls played on with one bow, but so basely and harshly that it will never do. But after three hours stay it could not be fixed in tune, and so they were fain to go on with some other musique of instruments."

There seems to be a curious fate reigning over the instruments which have the word "arch" prefixed to their name. They have no vitality, and somehow or other come to grief. Even the famous archlute, which was still a living thing in the time of Handel, has now disappeared from the concert-room and joined Mr. Pepys's "Arched Viall" in the limbo of things forgotten. Whether the latter twanged again on any subsequent occasion, and with less unharmonious results, the Diary does not say. Mr. Pepys's verdict, that it would never do, at any rate, has been fully confirmed by the event, as his predictions usually were, being, indeed, always founded on calm judgment and close observation. For the latter he had, with regard to this particular subject, a good opportunity in his own collection of musical instruments, the remnants of which are still in existence. It was not without good reason that, as early as August 21, 1663, when his prosperous days had scarcely yet begun, he could write: "This evening I paid Mr. Hunt £3 for my viall, and he tells me that I may, without flattery, say, I have as good a Theorbo viall and viallin as is in England."

How, four years later, Mr. Pepys was on the point of adding an organ to his collection, and how reasons of space and prudence prevented him from doing so, the following extract may tell: "At my bookseller's, and did buy 'L'illustre Bassa'* in four volumes for my wife. Meeting Dr. Gibbons,† he and I to see an organ at the Dean of Westminster's lodgings at the Abbey, the Bishop of Rochester's; where he lives like a great prelate, his lodgings being very good; though at present under great disgrace at Court, being put by his Clerk of the Closet's place. I saw his lady, of whom the Terrae Filius ‡ at Oxford was once so merry; and two children, whereof one a very pretty little boy, like him, so fat and so black. Here I saw the organ, but it is too big for my house and the fashion do not please me enough; and therefore I will not have it."

Readers may care to know that the "fat and black" boy so unceremoniously introduced grew up to be an Irish judge, and a baronet of Queen Anne's creation.

We next come to a short excursion on scientific ground, which, although it does not refer to the art of music, may be interesting to the pupils of Helmholtz and others, as a landmark in the history of acoustics. Mr. Pepys, it may be added, although a man of science and later on the President of the Royal Society, was too reasonable a man to believe in the monstrous idea propounded by some people nowadays, that composers as composers would be benefited by a knowledge of acoustics, or of what is absurdly called the science of music. In a passage, which will be quoted by-and-by, he classes music with "the other parts of mathematical knowledge," but this has reference to a more systematic and, therefore, more scientific method of teaching musical theory, which he justly advocates against the barbarous jargon of his contemporaries. As for acoustical science, he regarded it as being on the same footing with other branches of knowledge in which he took an interest, not as a musician or musical amateur, but merely as a man of wide culture and catholic intelligence. In explanation of the following passage, it should be stated that the Mr. Hooke referred to is Robert Hooke, a great scientific authority of the period, who frequently turns up in the Diary as a lecturer on the Comet of 1664, and on feltmaking, and as the author of a book "of the Microscope, which is so pretty that I presently bespoke it, and away home." This is Mr. Hooke's theory of vibrations, as connected with musical sounds:—

"August 8th, 1666. Discoursed with Mr. Hooke, whom I met in the streete, about the nature of sounds, and he did make me understand the nature of musical sounds made by strings mighty prettily; and told me that having come to a certain number of vibrations proper to make any tone, he is able to tell how many strokes a fly makes with his wings (those flies that hum in their flying) by the note it answers to during their flying. That, I suppose, is a little too much refined; but his discourse in general was mighty fine."

Speaking of acoustics, it will be well to mention one of the most curious passages in the Diary, curious in so far as it illustrates in the most striking manner the saying of Tacitus, "Rebus humanis inest quidam circulus." Here, at a very primitive period of dramatic music in England, we find foreshadowed the idea carried out at the Wagner Theatre at Bayreuth, the idea of the invisible orchestra. The Theatre Royal, at which this idea was first tried, was one of the predecessors of "Old Drury," being situated near Drury Lane, although not yet called by the name of its local habitation.

"May 8th, 1663. Thence to my brother's, and there took up my wife and Ashwell to the Theatre Royal, being the second day of its being opened. The house is made with extraordinary good contrivance, and yet hath some faults, as the narrowness of the passages in and out of the pitt, and the distance from the stage to the boxes, which I am confident cannot hear; but for all other things it is well, only, above all, the musique being below and most of it sounding under the very stage, there is no hearing of the basses at all, nor very well of the trebles, which sure must be mended."

* "Ibrahim, ou l'illustre Bassa." It was the first of that almost interminable series of "Twelve vast French romances, neatly gilt," published by Magdaleine de Scudéri. It was printed in 1641.—M. B.

† Christopher Gibbons, the second son of the great Orlando. Born in 1615; appointed organist of Westminster Abbey, 1660; Doctor of Music, Oxon., 1664; died 1676. He is buried in the cloisters of the Abbey.

‡ A scholar appointed to make a satirical and jesting speech at an Act in the University of Oxford. The custom was discontinued about the beginning of the last century.—M. B.

Mr. Pepys's censure, it should be remembered, applies to a time when "musique," both orchestral and choral, was executed on a small scale; had he known the gigantic bands of modern days perhaps he would have judged differently.

To conclude, we must hear a little of one of Mr. Pepys's favourite hobbies, the reform of musical theory, which in those days of scholastic nomenclature, with a very vague meaning at the back of it, was, indeed, urgently needed. The new scheme, including, as we have seen, a remodelled system of notation, was as eagerly sought by Mr. Pepys as if it had been the philosopher's stone. More than once the secret seems within his reach. "All the evening," he writes, 20th of March, 1668—after a day's hard work at the Office "to enable us to set out 27 ships"—"pricking down some things and trying some conclusions upon my viall, in order to the inventing of a better theory of musick than hath yet been abroad; and I think verily I shall do it." Whether he ever "did it," and what was the result, is more than the present writer professes to know. Some light on the general bearings of Mr. Pepys's theory is thrown by a passage in one of his letters, written many years after the close of his Diary, and not long before the close of his life. But his love of music never left Mr. Pepys, and well might he have promised to be faithful to Polyhymnia "till death do us part." The letter is dated Clapham, November 5, 1700, and is addressed to Dr. Charlett of Oxford, and refers to a scheme of teaching the "Mathematical Sciences" propounded by another learned man, Dr. Gregory, and submitted to Mr. Pepys by the first-named divine. Music, it appears, had no place in Dr. Gregory's scheme, and after a few introductory remarks, Mr. Pepys begins accordingly:—

"To which, what I would now recommend to your giving the same regard to, with the particulars therein named, is first Music—a science peculiarly productive of a pleasure that no state of life, public or private, secular or sacred, no difference of age or season, no temper of mind or condition of health, exempt from present anguish, nor, lastly, distinction of quality, renders either improper, untimely, or unentertaining. Witness the universal gusto we see it followed with, wherever to be found, by all whose leisure and purse can bear it; while the same might, to much better effect, both for variety and delight to themselves and friends, be ever to be had within their own walls, and of their own composes too, as well as others—were the doctrine of it brought within the simplicity, perspicuity, and certainty, common to all other parts of mathematical knowledge, and of which I take this to be equally capable with any of them, in lieu of that fruitless jargon of obsolete terms, and other unnecessary perplexities and obscurities, wherewith it has been ever hitherto delivered, and from which, as I know of nothing eminent, or even tolerable, left us by the ancients, so neither have I met with one modern master (foreign or domestic) owning the least obligation to it, for any of their now nobler compositions; but, on the contrary, charging all (and justly too) upon the happiness of their own genius only, joined with the drudgery of a long and unassisted practice."

The passage is well worth serious contemplation. It is interesting also from a literary point, showing as it does the different style of Mr. Pepys's learned correspondence from that of the Diary. Instead of felicitous, albeit unconscious, grace of expression, we have here long and involved sentences, and a train of thought not always easy to follow. But through all shines a true and earnest love of the art.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. X.—BERLIOZ.

THIS composer has sketched himself with a fulness of detail and a frankness of statement which leave us in no doubt whatever as to the sort of man he was. A more striking and remarkable individuality never figured in the domain of music, and the task of reproducing in outline the master's portrait, as drawn and filled in by his own hand, cannot fail of interest to the doer, or, however badly accomplished, to those on whose behalf it is attempted.

Over the childhood of Berlioz we may pass lightly. The son of the village doctor of Côte Saint André appears to have been something out of the common from infancy. Highly sensitive to beauty in any form, music began to make a deep impression upon him when he was admitted to his first communion, by special favour, in the chapel of a convent, where singing maidens clothed in white surrounded him. He believed that, like Stephen, he saw the heavens opened, and became so pious that he went to Mass every day, and to confession as frequently as possible. "Father," he would say to his spiritual director, "I have done nothing;" and the priest would answer, "My son, so continue." Berlioz adds that he too often followed the advice. Of course, this sensitive nature fell in love—at twelve years—and, naturally, with a damsel much older than himself. Estelle Gautier was the name of the honoured maiden. She was eighteen, grandly beautiful, and disposed to ridicule her little lover. This made the heart of the boy desolate. "I hid myself," he tells us, "like a wounded bird, mute and suffering." But Estelle went her way, married, bore children, put on flesh, and when Berlioz again met her she did not know him. So does a real world settle the affairs of the ideal. Denied the happiness of reciprocated love, the boy sought the consolation of such music as, after a lesson or two in fingering from his father, he could get out of a flageolet. From the flageolet he rose to the flute, then studied harmony from a book by Alémbert, and wrote two quintets, which he burnt. His compositions at this period must have been melancholy things. "Nearly all my melodies were in the minor mode. I was conscious of the fault, but could not avoid it. A black veil covered my thoughts." Meanwhile his father would not allow him to study the pianoforte. He intended the boy for his own profession, and feared that the instrument would be too seductive. On this Berlioz characteristically says:—

"When I consider the frightful quantity of platitudes which it (the pianoforte) facilitates day after day, and that their authors could not, for the most part, write at all if, deprived of their musical kaleidoscope, they had nothing but pen and paper, I am bound to thank the chance which obliged me to compose silently and freely, shielded me from the tyranny of finger habits, so dangerous to thought, and from the seductive influence which the sonority of commonplace always exerts upon the composer."

In 1822, he being then nineteen years old, Berlioz went to Paris as a medical student, but, despite parental injunctions, he gave himself up more and more to the charms of music, and eventually offered himself to Lesueur as a pupil, on the strength of a cantata for voices and grand orchestra which he had written. The old man looked at the work and said: "There is a good deal of fire and dramatic energy there, but you don't know how to write, and your harmony contains so many faults that it is useless to point any of them out." Upon this Berlioz was sent back to elementary studies in the antiquated system to which Lesueur adhered. No two men could have been more unlike in temperament and taste than master and pupil here, but Lesueur took kindly to the young medical student, walked with him in the public gardens, and even permitted him to assail the very system of harmony which the one taught and the other learned. The self-confidence of Berlioz at this period was sublime. He asked M. Andrieux, his professor of literature, to write him an opera libretto; tried to borrow 1,200 francs from M. de Châteaubriand, to meet the expenses of bringing out a Mass, and having composed a scena which he thought might be introduced into "Athalie," at the Theatre Français, he actually started to open negotiations with Talma on the subject. But the great tragedian was spared an interview:—

"Approaching his house I felt a bad augury in the beating of my heart. The very sight of the door made me tremble, and upon the threshold I stopped in frightful perplexity. Should I go farther? Should I give up the idea? Twice I lifted my arm to ring the bell; twice I let it fall to my side, the blood rushed to my face and sounded in my ears; a tumult raged within me. Finally, timidity prevailed; and, sacrificing all my hopes, I went, or rather ran, away as fast as I could."

The story of the Mass to which reference has already been made shows that Berlioz, though afraid to face Talma, could encounter and struggle victoriously against bitter disappointment. M. Masson, chapel-master of St. Roch, having suggested that he should write a Mass for Innocents' Day, Berlioz set to work with all the ardour of his nature, and soon finished a composition which imitated the style of Lesueur. Faithfully promised an orchestra one hundred strong, with voices to match, he naturally desired to obtain the services of a conductor accustomed to control large numbers of executants. Hereupon, with the audacity peculiarly his own, he brought the influence of Lesueur to bear upon M. Valentino, of the Grand-Opéra, and, what is more, succeeded. But, alas for the sanguine and unreflecting confidence of youth. "The day of general rehearsal arrived, and with it our great mass of voices and instruments, which turned out to be fifteen tenors, five basses, two boys, nine violins, a viola, an oboe, a horn, and a bassoon. Judge of my shame and despair in offering to the renowned chief of one of the first orchestras in the world such a musical phalanx. 'Be calm,' M. Masson kept saying, 'it will be all right at performance.' Resigned to circumstances, Valentino gave the signal to commence, but in a few moments every one began to find his copy full of faults. Here they had forgotten to write the sharps or flats of the key, there they had left out rests, in another place they had omitted thirty bars. . . . I suffered the torments of hell, and was eventually obliged to give up, for that time, the attempt at realising my long-cherished dream of a grand orchestral performance." This failure, however, did the young man good, and he confesses it with the frankness that makes his autobiography so charming. In the little of the Mass that was heard its composer detected many faults, and bravely resolved to write it nearly all over again. Meanwhile, his parents had heard of the failure at St. Roch, and added to his troubles by turning his musical pretensions into ridicule. "But," he tells us, "I swallowed all in silence and persisted none the less."

Anxious for the rewritten Mass, and failing to borrow 1,200 francs of Châteaubriand, Berlioz became profoundly discouraged, when chance—if chance there be in men's affairs—threw him in the way of a young man, Augustin de Pons, with whom he had previously formed some acquaintance. Here was the longed-for Deus ex machinâ. De Pons found the money; the chorus of the Opéra was engaged, with a full orchestra, Valentino conducted, and the Mass was splendidly performed. Was Berlioz now satisfied with his work? Let him answer: "After this new trial I could not entertain a doubt as to the little value of my Mass, and taking out the 'Resurrexit,' with which I was satisfied, I burned the rest, along with the Beverley scena, . . . the opera of 'Estelle,' and a Latin oratorio, 'The Passage of the Red Sea,' that I had just finished. A cold, inquisitorial eye made me discover its incontestable right to figure in that auto-da-fè." By the way Berlioz destroyed the "Resurrexit" some time after, and a grim fate eventually decided that De Pons should put an end to his life by taking poison. Which he did.

Lesueur now wished Berlioz to enter his harmony class at the Conservatoire, but did not think it necessary to introduce him just then to Cherubini, the formidable head of that institution. As a matter of fact, Berlioz and the Florentine had met before under circumstances which the younger man feared his elder would remember. The meeting came about in this way. Responsible for the good order of the Conservatoire, Cherubini had provided separate entrances for the male and female students, of which arrangement Berlioz being ignorant, he, one day, going to the public library, passed in at the door set apart for ladies. A servant tried to stop him, but in vain. Berlioz pushed on, and had soon forgotten the incident in the work of reading a score of Gluck. A few minutes later Cherubini entered with the servant, who, pointing out Berlioz, said, "There he is." "Cherubini was so angry that he could scarcely articulate. 'Ah, ah, ah, ah! it is you,' he said at last, with an Italian accent which rage made more droll; 'it is you who enter by the forbidden door!' 'Monsieur, I did not know your rule; another time I will conform to it.' 'Another time! what brings you here?' 'You see, monsieur, I come to study the scores of Gluck.' 'How do the scores of Gluck concern you? Who gave you leave to come to the library?' 'Monsieur (I began to lose my coolness), I consider Gluck's scores the most beautiful in dramatic music, and I want nobody's leave to study here. From ten to three the library is open to the public, and I have a right to profit by the fact.' 'The right!' 'Yes, Monsieur.' 'I forbid you to come again.' 'I shall come, all the same.' 'What do you call yourself?' cried he, trembling with rage. Pale in my turn, I answered, 'Monsieur, you will perhaps know my name some day, but to-day—you shall not learn it.' 'Stop him, Hottin (Hottin was the servant), I will put him in prison.' Both master and man, to the stupefaction of the lookers-on, then chased me round the table, upsetting forms and desks, without power to catch me, and I escaped, saying, with a peal of laughter, 'You shall have neither me nor my name, and I shall come back soon, again to study the scores of Gluck.'" In prospect of entering the Conservatoire, Berlioz was a little anxious about the retentiveness of Cherubini's memory. Curiously enough, Hottin afterwards became Berlioz' orchestral attendant, and the most furious partisan of his music.

Our young musician now entered upon a final struggle with his parents, who continued bitterly opposed to his choice of music as a profession. Ordered to return home, he duly obeyed, and met with a cold reception. For some time both parties were silent and sulky, but at last the father announced his resolution to permit the son's return to Paris for a course of musical study, on the understanding that it should be abandoned if, in a reasonable time, proofs of exceptional talent were not forthcoming. This, however, was to be kept a secret from Madame Berlioz, whose pious horror of everything connected with the stage made her objections immovable. As it happened she discovered the arrangement, and, one day, there was a very painful scene between her and her boy. "Your father," she said to me, dropping the habitual tutoiement, 'has had the weakness to consent to your return to Paris; he favours your extravagant and culpable projects. I will incur no such reproach, and I formally object to your going.' 'Mother!' 'Yes, I oppose it; and I implore you, Hector, not to persist in your folly. Hold; I throw myself at your knees, I, your mother, and humbly beg you to give it up.' 'My God, mother, permit me to raise you; I cannot bear the sight!' 'No, I remain.' Then after a moment's silence, 'Thou refusest, miserable! Thou canst, without yielding, see thy mother at thy feet! Well then go. Go to drag thyself through the filth of Paris, to dishonour thy name, to kill thy father and me with shame and vexation. I shall leave the house till thou art gone. Thou art no longer my son; I curse thee.'" Madame Berlioz kept her word. She left the house for another possessed by the family at some distance, and thither, just before starting for Paris, Hector repaired with his two sisters in hope of reconciliation. "My mother, who was reading in the garden, no sooner saw us than she rose and fled. We waited long, we followed her, my father called her, my sisters and I wept, but all in vain, and I was compelled to go away without embracing my mother, without a word, a look, and charged with her malediction."

Once more in Paris, Berlioz began to practise habits of strict economy, hoping thus to return the money advanced by De Pons, who was now in want of it. Stopping his dinners at the restaurant, he sat daily at the foot of Henry IV.'s statue on the Pont-Neuf and consumed bread and dried fruits. Meanwhile he laboured hard at his opera "Les Francs Juges," with, as usual, no return. "The poem was refused at the Opéra, and my score condemned to obscurity from which it has never emerged. Only the overture has been able to see the light. I have used here and there the best ideas of the work in later compositions; the rest will probably meet with the same fate should occasion arise, or be burnt." Winter came on. He could no longer dine al fresco on bread and figs; he needed fuel and warm clothes. But how to get these things? The allowance from home had been stopped; pupils had fallen away through neglect, and no resource was left. Just then the Théâtre des Nouveautés opened for comic opera. "I ran to the régisseur and begged the place of flute in the orchestra. All places were filled up. I asked to join the chorus. They needed no more singers. Death and furies!! The régisseur, however, took my address, and promised to let me know if they decided to increase the chorus." In a little while this came about, and Berlioz presented himself at the theatre to compete with half-a-dozen 'poor devils' for the position of a bass chorister at fifty francs a month. The régisseur acted as judge, and a violinist played the accompaniments on his instrument. Following the half-dozen, who did their best with carefully prepared songs, came Berlioz, and him the régisseur asked what he had brought. 'I? nothing!' 'How nothing? What are you going to sing then?' 'Anything you like. Is there not a score here, or some sheet of vocalises?' 'We have nothing of the kind. Besides,' continued the régisseur, in a tone somewhat contemptuous, 'you cannot, I suppose, sing at sight?' 'Pardon, I will sing at sight anything you like to give me.' 'Ah, that's different. However, as we have no music, can't you sing some known piece from memory?' 'Yes, I know by heart "Les Danaïdes," "Stratonice," "La Vestale," "Cortez," "Edipe," the two "Iphigenias," "Orphée," "Armide"——'Stop, stop. What a memory! Come, since you know so much, give us the air from Sacchini's "Edipe"——'Elle m'a prodigué.'" 'Willingly.' 'Thou canst accompany it, Michel.' 'But I don't know the key.' 'E flat. Shall I give the recitative?' Michel played the chord of E flat, and I began." In the result, the half-dozen took a sad departure, and Berlioz entered into the enjoyment of fifty francs a month, on the strength of which he shared two rooms with a young student of chemistry, as poor as himself. The incipient pharmacist did the cooking and Berlioz the marketing, carrying his provisions exposed in a basket through the street. "We lived thus like princes—emigrants, for thirty francs a month each, and I had never since my arrival in Paris enjoyed so much ease." He actually bought a piano, though he could not play, and "such a piano!" It cost a hundred and ten francs!

About this time Berlioz composed his overture, "Waverley," and competed for the Grand Prix de Rome, with no other result than to have his piece declared "inexecutable" by the jury. To make matters worse, he was attacked by illness in the midst of his disappointment. "Antoine (the young chemist) spent his time in running after grisettes, and left me alone all day and part of the night; I had no servant or nurse to wait upon me, and believe I should have died one evening if, in a paroxysm of anguish, I had not, with a penknife, pierced an abscess in my throat. This unscientific operation was the signal for recovery." Then other clouds began to break. Berlioz père, repenting of having withdrawn his son's allowance, resumed its regular payment, upon which Hector gave up his engagement at the theatre, and devoted himself passionately to study and attendance at the Opéra, where, with borrowed scores of the works performed, he "read up" instrumentation in a thoroughly practical way. Berlioz was now a fanatical admirer of Gluck. He cared little for the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart—as performed by a thin band in a large hall; of Beethoven he knew little, and Rossini he detested. The Rossini fever excited in him an anger the more violent because the Italian composer's music was the antithesis of that of Gluck and Spontini. "Conceiving nothing more magnificently fine and true than the works of those great masters, the melodic cynicism, the contempt of dramatic expression and requirements; the continual reproduction of one form of cadence; the eternal and puerile crescendo, and the brutal grosse caisse of Rossini exasperated me to such a point that I could not recognise, even in his 'Barbiere,' the shining qualities of his genius. I more than once asked myself then why I could not undermine the Théâtre-Italien and blow all the Rossinians into the air." As a Gluckist and a critical listener at the Opéra, Berlioz soon showed himself to be a formidable person. He gathered round him a number of young men whom he strove to make as fanatical as himself. He would procure or purchase tickets for these on Gluck nights, and, entering as soon as the doors were opened, gather his disciples around him and harangue them on the merits of the work about to be performed. Woe to the direction if it ventured to "improve" the favourite master's scores. The young man in the parterre, with the keen face and long black hair, knew them all by heart, and was swift of exposure. One night they introduced cymbals into the Scythian ballet of "Iphigenia in Tauride." "Boiling with anger, I nevertheless restrained myself to nearly the end of the dance, when profiting by a moment of silence I shouted with all the strength of my lungs, 'There should be no cymbals there. Who allows himself to correct Gluck?' The public, who don't see very clearly into these art questions, and concern themselves little whether an author's instrumentation be changed or not, failed to understand the fury of the young fool in the pit. But this was even worse when, in the third act, the trombones that accompany the monologue of Orestes being suppressed, the same voice cried out, 'The trombones should not be silent. This is insupportable!' The astonishment of the orchestra and the house could not compare with the anger (very natural, I grant) of Valentino, who conducted that evening. . . . But I know well that subsequently all was put right; the cymbals were silenced; the trombones played, and I muttered between my teeth, 'Ah! that's better.'" It is to be feared that Berlioz and his well-taught, well-drilled band, were somewhat of a nuisance at the Opéra. They drove the chef de claque wild by applauding such things as a happy modulation or a good accent in recitative, and thus upsetting all his combinations. But in vain he scowled. The impassioned young fellows in the pit were worthy of their leader, who yielded himself body and soul to the influences of the artistic moment. One day Berlioz took to the Opéra a recruit who was ignorant of music, and, as it soon appeared, insensible to its power. "The woes of Antigone and her father moved him very little, and seeing I could do nothing with him I moved to a bench in front so as not to be troubled by his coldness. But, as though to throw his impassibility into relief, chance placed on his other hand a spectator as impressionable as he was the reverse. . . . I could not help hearing the dialogue that went on behind me between my young man, sucking an orange, and his neighbour, a prey to the most lively emotion. 'For Heaven's sake, sir, be calm.' 'No. It is irresistible; it is frightful; it will kill me.' 'But, sir, you are wrong to give way like that. You will make yourself ill.' 'No; let me alone. Oh!' 'Come, sir, cheer up; after all it's only a play. Let me offer you a piece of orange.' 'Ah! it is sublime!' 'It is a Maltese orange.' 'What heavenly art!' 'Don't refuse me.' 'Ah, sir; what music!' 'Yes, it's very fine.'" Soon after, Berlioz was himself moved to tears by the drama, seeing which the sensitive stranger embraced him from behind, exclaiming in convulsive tones, "Sacré dieu, monsieur, how fine it is," while the public laughed at both, and the impassive recruit went on sucking his orange.

THE FATHER OF THE SYMPHONY.

By L. NOHL.

THERE can be no doubt that, as regards the combination of various instruments and their characterisation and distinct individualisation in the orchestra, Haydn had, in the first instance, been guided by the model furnished by the so-called Mannheim School. In the year 1777, Mozart, in a letter dated from Mannheim, writes: "The orchestra here is very good and strong, on each side ten or eleven violins, four violas, two oboes, two flutes and two clarinets, two horns, four celli, four bassoons, four contrabasses, trumpets, and kettle-drums." More than twenty years before that date, however, this orchestra had already been famous, being considered by all competent judges the foremost in Europe. To this fact both the father of Mozart and Dr. Burney bear eloquent testimony, the latter dwelling especially upon the novel effect produced by the crescendo and diminuendo, as here practised, "whereas the piano had hitherto been chiefly made use of in contrast with the forte, in the manner of an echo." J. F. Reichardt, again, graphically describes the effect exercised upon him by this orchestra, saying that he "lost his breath in the crescendo, only regaining it in the diminuendo." These effects, then, mark a decided step forward in the dramatic animation of instrumental music, while another important element, viz., the employment in their proper place of the individual instruments, and, above all, their judicious blending, rendered it possible for the composer to add complexion and eyes, as it were, to the physiognomy of his contemplated tone-picture. Thus, an orchestra of virtuosi, such as the Mannheim capelle could boast, would of itself act as an inspiration upon its conductor, in whose scores something of the tradition of its excellence could not fail to become embodied.

The founder of the school in question, Johann Stamitz, who flourished about the year 1756, was himself the composer of some symphonies, and must be regarded as the prototype of our master as regards instrumentation, as there can scarcely be a doubt that the latter had become acquainted with these works. Besides the above, the German Agrell, of Cassel, and the Frenchman Gossec should be mentioned as precursors of Haydn in the composition of symphonies for a combination of numerous instruments; Gossec having, moreover, also made use of the minuet similarly to our composer. Whereas a Symphony by Ph. E. Bach, published in the year 1759, is still scored for the modest complement of two violins, tenor, and bass-violin only, we find that Haydn, in his first work of that description, employs in addition to these instruments, two oboes and two French horns, while in his second Symphony ("Le Midi") the score includes two flutes, two oboes, bassoon, and two French horns, thereby exceeding the orchestral limits of the Eisenstadt capelle. For this latter reason, too, the composer generally adheres to the more restricted proportions of his earlier work for some time afterwards, and only gradually he begins to make "experiments" with his orchestra and its separate instruments for the purpose of individualising his instrumentation, and of seeing "what might produce effect or weaken it." In this direction he undoubtedly gained much, nay, most, of his experience at a later period in Vienna, under the influence of Gluck and Mozart. Although, in his old age, he was justified in saying, "I was no virtuoso on any one instrument, yet I understood the capacity and the power for effect of every one," we may, with equal justice, place by the side of this utterance an observation made by him still later to Kalkbrenner: "Only in my decrepit age have I learnt the use of the wind instruments; now that I know it I must needs go without being able to apply it."

"Haydn invariably conceived his works at the pianoforte," Griesinger tells us, continuing, in the composer's own words: "I sat down at the piano and began to improvise, and according to the temporary disposition of my mind I would be melancholy or merry, serious or playful." But, unlike the many fast-writing musicians of his day, he would not convey a note to paper until the "idea" which his mind had gathered at the instrument had become perfectly matured, "leaving no residue in the heart that properly appertained to it." It is true, in his earlier compositions we must not look for the profound depths of soul displayed in the Pastorale of the "Christmas Oratorio," or other similarly great effusions of the mighty Cantor of Leipzig. We should be deprived of all our taste and appreciation for them by doing this. Yet already, in 1782, J. F. Reichardt speaks with delight of the "original humour and most animated and pleasing jocularity" displayed by Haydn, adding, with perfect justice, that, in his opinion, no composer had ever combined so much simplicity and variety with an equal amount of pleasing and legitimate popularity. These words, indeed, expressed the very essence of Haydn's music. He conducts us into real life and its immediate manifestations as they present themselves to his inner consciousness. And if, from first to last, his manner of doing this remains simple and childlike, the reason must be sought for in the general character of his time, which, in other matters as in Art, had only just commenced to direct its attention to the world we actually live in. But if Haydn had done so much without the aid of poetry and the stage, merely by the voice speaking in his orchestra, the seeds thus sown and allowed to develop must needs have born glorious fruit. Nor was the natural course of events impeded in this respect. Just as Klopstock and Lessing were followed by Goethe and Schiller, so were Gluck and Haydn succeeded by Mozart and Beethoven, the ultimate artistic achievement in both parallel cases being the innermost appreciation and delineation of life from its most naïve state to its deepest tragical conflicts. As regards music, the importance of the "cyclical" character of the Sonata-form, made permanent by the genius of Haydn, will at once become apparent. For music, unaided by other accessories, was enabled, within this frame, to depict an entire course of mental dispositions and conflicts, thus placing the Symphony, in a measure, side by side with the Drama enacted on the stage. The full significance however, of the initiatory step taken by our composer has been demonstrated in its ultimate bearings, a hundred years after the appearance of Haydn's first Symphony, in the modern "symphonic poem," although the latter is sufficiently foreshadowed by Beethoven in his demand of a "poetic idea" pervading the symphony. And it is in this direction, also, where the mental and formal progress of music, beyond the compositions of Bach and Handel, must be traced.

Returning to the special subject of our contemplation we cannot do better than continue to quote from the observations made by Reichardt concerning our composer's artistic development: "Gradually his humorous freaks became more manly, his elaboration more deliberate, until a more serious view of life, and consequent earnest study, matured in him the special qualities of an original mind and excellent artist." Becoming more and more conscious of the source from whence his ideas flow, he strives to produce them in their pristine purity. "The free arts, and the fine science of musical composition will not suffer the fetters of a craft; free must be both mind and soul in their exercise," says our composer in the year 1779, in reply to a certain Society requesting his membership, under condition of his supplying annually a composition according to their choice.

Again, in the year 1787, he says, with reference to the oratorio "Die sieben Worte des Erlöser's am Kreuze" (The Passion), that the ideas embodied in its instrumental portion alone could not fail to "produce a deep impression upon even the most inexperienced." Nor can there be any doubt that the various religious moods appear most markedly indicated in the orchestration of the work in question, albeit, according to our modern feelings and as compared with J. S. Bach, more tender and soft than profound and great. In the year 1790, to quote another characteristic instance, our composer presents to his highly esteemed Viennese friend, Frau von Genzinger, a sonata "entirely new, and only exclusively intended for your ladyship."

In the Adagio, he adds, there is "a great deal of meaning, much sentiment. I could wish to say such a deal to your ladyship, and to confess so much wherein your ladyship alone could grant me absolution." The sonata thus referred to is by all appearances the one in E flat major (Edition Peters, No. 3), where, indeed, we can most plainly distinguish, in the first movement, the voices of a male and a female holding conversation; while in the following Adagio Cantabile we have the calm self-contemplation of a noble mind at peace with itself and the world—a reflection, in fact, of the composer's own inmost soul. With his growing manliness and gradual deepening of his individuality, there came "ideas which hovered before his mind, and for which he strove to find a musical expression." Thus he relates to Griesinger how he had frequently portrayed "moral characters" in his symphonies, and that in one of his earliest he had embodied "the remonstrance of the Supreme Being with a hardened sinner, while the latter, in his perverseness, disregarded the admonition." One of these earlier symphonies is entitled "The Philosopher," another "The Absent-minded," one of his Divertimentos is called "The Love-sick Schoolmaster." All these are the germs of that delineation of real life which Haydn, above all the composers of his time, developed in the sphere of instrumental music.

He was, therefore, entitled to say, when near the end of his earthly career: "I believe that I have done my duty, and have wrought some good in the world by my works." Mozart, according to F. Rochlitz, says of him: "There is no one who can do everything, namely be waggish, and then move us profoundly, excite our laughter, and again touch our heart deeply; and all this with equal mastery, except Joseph Haydn." And this holds good not only as regards his symphonies but also his minor compositions. What can be more pathetic than some of his pianoforte adagios, notably that of the Sonata in D major, i.e., the Largo e sostenuto written in D minor, and concluding interrogatively in the dominant harmony? Transferred to a larger canvas, this movement would have become a monumental work of art! "Go, my dear Hummel, and look at the place where Haydn was born; a poor cottage where such a great man came to life," was Beethoven's remark even on his death-bed; and certain it is that no one was more competent to distinguish those traditional formal phrases—those noisy finales, for instance, where one fancies he hears the clatter of the dishes and plates at the princely table, and the bustle of the guests rising from their seats—from that which truly appertained to Haydn's genius. That, on the other hand, our composer distinctly foresaw the ultimate bearings of the progress which he had initiated is proved by his remark to Griesinger relative to Beethoven. "His sphere of activity," he said, about the year 1805, "is unlimited; what music has done already is nothing as compared with what it can yet do." Need we dwell upon the decisive influence exercised by Haydn's symphonies and quartets, upon such composers as Cherubini (vide his "Water-Carrier") and Rossini (vide his "Barber of Seville"), an influence which both these masters have repeatedly admitted, the former distinctly calling our composer his "musical father." C. M. von Weber and Franz Schubert, do they not equally derive much of their naïve melodiousness from the same source, more so even than from Mozart? Liszt, too, in some of his compositions for the Church, gives reminiscences of the songs of his Austrian fatherland, such as Haydn first embodied in his immortal works. Lastly, the man who has put his stamp upon the modern musical epoch, and who, together with Beethoven, has fully disclosed the treasury of German art-consciousness, Richard Wagner, significantly observes in his "Kunstwerk der Zukunft": "In Haydn's symphonies, the rhythmical dance-tune manifests itself with all the cheerfulness and freshness of youth. The joining of hands, the separations and the réunions incidental to the dancing, although illustrated by the most consummate contrapuntal skill, appear nevertheless not so much the result of such artistic ability, than as being regulated by the fanciful laws of the dance itself, so warmly do they breathe the atmosphere of healthy human cheerfulness and life." And this "dance movement" has been made use of by Mozart, and still more by Beethoven, for the illustration of every other life-movement, from sublime serenity down to the regions of passionate despair. We thus are able to appreciate to its fullest extent the significance of the "atmosphere of healthy human cheerfulness and life" which we breathe in Haydn's works. The symphony, in fact, is—as we once more distinctly assert, in conclusion—the musical twin-sister of the drama, and appreciating, as we all do, the importance of the latter in the art of poetry, we also know how to value the merit of him whom the world now justly regards as "The Father of the Symphony."

PONCHIELLI'S OPERA "THE PRODIGAL SON."

It is long since the Scala at Milan has witnessed an event so important, from a musical point of view, as the production, on the 26th of December, 1880, of Ponchielli's recently completed lyrical drama "Il Figliuolo Prodigio." So much had been said and written about this new work, and so great had been the preparations for its first performance, that the expectations of the Milanese, ever clamourers for novelty, had been raised to a high pitch. And certainly, so far as the music could be appreciated on a first hearing; so far as a magnificent mise-en-scène, and the co-operation of first-class artists, like Signori Tamagno, and de Reszké, and Signora d'Angeri, could enhance its effect, the performance was a brilliant success. And Ponchielli fully deserved this success, the more so as for many years, spent in comparative obscurity, fortune did not smile upon him.

A native of Cremona, he received and completed his musical training at the Conservatoire of Milan, and subsequently became a candidate for one of the professorships in that Institution. The post, however, was given to a competitor who, it appears, had less talent but more interest; and writhing under this failure, Ponchielli returned to Cremona, where, faute de mieux, he accepted the conductorship of a local band—a very inadequate field for a young man of his ability and ambition. It was not until the score of his opera, "I Promessi Sposi,"* which had been brought out at Cremona as early as 1856, fell into the hands of Petrella, who had himself, though unsuccessfully, treated the same subject, that his still undeveloped talent came to be recognised. His more recent and more mature work, "La Gioconda,"† for the great success of which he is to a considerable extent indebted to Boito's excellent libretto, firmly established his fame, and led to the "Figliuolo Prodigio," as the latest composition of one of Italy's most prominent and gifted musicians.

Viewed in a strictly musical sense, the "Figliuolo Prodigio" may be regarded as the most elaborate, most finished, and most advanced work Ponchielli has so far produced; a work which reflects his talent as a dramatic and polyphonic writer in every page, and not unfrequently exhibits flashes of true genius. But again, as in the case of the "Promessi Sposi," he has been somewhat unhappy in the choice of his subject. However beautiful the parable of the prodigal son, it is so simple that it affords little or no scope for dramatic development even when treated by an imaginative Italian librettist. Even Scribe discovered this to his cost when he dramatised the same subject for Auber; and Zanardini, the author of the libretto of Ponchielli's opera, has not been more successful; however he has enlarged the subject by introducing other elements and depicting the scenes of "riotous living." The three salient features of the subject, viz., the Farewell, Absence, and Return, which Beethoven's genius condensed into ten pages of one of his most beautiful sonatas, are in the opera before us spread over four acts; and the weakest, fortunately also the shortest, of these is the last, viz., the Return, which brings the work to an abrupt and somewhat feeble conclusion.

The following is an outline of the dramatic action: The first act is laid in the peaceful valley of Jessen, in Judea. Ruben and his ward Jefte are preparing the Easter-offering, and are anxiously awaiting Azaele, Ruben's son, who at last arrives in the company of two strangers, Amenofi, an Assyrian adventurer, and Nefte, his female companion. They are on their way to Nineveh, and, while enjoying Ruben's hospitality, induce Azaele to accompany them to the Assyrian capital. The marvellous accounts of the feasts and splendour that await him there are too much for the young Jew, and though he is betrothed to Jefte, and encounters the opposition of his father, he joins the Assyrians and leaves his home.

Arrived at Nineveh he at once becomes a convert to the worship of Ilia, and, a prey to Amenofi's craft, plunges into the whirlpool of feasting and pleasure. Nefte, in the meantime, has conceived a violent passion for the prodigal young Jew, and seeing that he is on the verge of ruin, endeavours in vain to open his eyes to the meshes Amenofi has laid for him. It is during one of the public feasts incidental to the worship of Ilia, that Ruben and Jefte, who have made their way to Nineveh in search of Azaele, appear on the scene, and, being recognised as Jews, are promptly sentenced to death. Azaele finds Jefte awaiting her doom, and resolves by a supreme effort to save her and his father. In the Temple, before the assembled priests and the populace, he proclaims that he is a Jew, and defies Ilia, the goddess whose temple he has violated. The scene of commotion which follows enables Ruben and Jefte to escape; at least we are left to infer this, for it is not stated in the libretto.

The last act takes us once more to the valley of Jessen, and once more we find Ruben and Jefte preparing the Easter-offering, when a stranger, poor and haggard, comes to beg shelter and food. It is needless to say that this stranger is no other than Azaele, who, in a way which the opera leaves to our imagination, has escaped from Nineveh, and is received with open arms by his father, as the prodigal son "who was lost and is found."

It may be imagined that the scenes at Nineveh, in the Temple and on the banks of the Tigris, are depicted in the most gorgeous and oriental colours. The spectacular display in the second and third acts has rarely been equalled even at the Scala; the opulence of the Assyrian capital, the rejoicings of the populace, the religious ceremonial, the games, the dances of the serpent-charmers, the saturnalia, and similar scenes, contrast effectually with the simplicity of the Jewish home as portrayed in the first and fourth acts; and successfully cover many of the shortcomings in the dramatic action.

* See THE MUSICAL TIMES, December, 1880.

† See THE MUSICAL TIMES, August, 1880.

It is to this contrast that Ponchielli has adapted his score with remarkable felicity. Accordingly, the music of the first and fourth acts is soft, pathetic, pastoral, in keeping with the character and surroundings of Azalee, clad with a garment of wool; that of the second and third acts sensuous, turbulent, almost semi-savage, in keeping with Azalee clad in purple and the scenes at Nineveh. It is only when Ruben and Jefte appear on the scene of riotous living that some of the plaintive subjects of the first act are heard through the elaborately figured and saturnalian music of the third act.

Similar contrasts are, in a different form, to be found in Halévy's "Juive" and Rubinstein's "Macabees"; but Ponchielli's style, as foreshadowed in the "Promessi Sposi," developed in "Gioconda," and carried to its logical consequences in the "Figliuol Prodigo," is full of individuality. His harmonic combinations, his sudden passages from major to minor, his persistent use of certain semitones, and his instrumentation are all his own, and stamp him as a first-rate polyphonic writer of both lyrical and dramatic power. Now and then we seem to discover traces of Boito, Wagner, and even Meyerbeer; yet, to our mind, Ponchielli's music is, though essentially Italian, perhaps more akin to that of Goetz, the lamented composer of the "Taming of the Shrew," than to that of any other author. Like all composers who have a style of their own, Ponchielli is not always intelligible on a first hearing; and this is the more true in Italy, where this polyphonic style—avvenirismo, as it is often termed—is as yet new. And Ponchielli has, moreover, this peculiarity, that his most luminous ideas seem to come upon him almost abruptly. Thus many of his airs begin with a beautiful phrase, clearly enunciated; then—not unlike those of Brahms—they undergo or are forced through various changes and modulations, which often impair their transparency, until they suddenly gain in clearness and reach the climax with some of those thrilling vocal and instrumental effects which invariably carry away the audience. This peculiarity is very noticeable in the "Figliuol Prodigo"; but Ponchielli has this great merit, that in his airs the voice always soars clearly above the rich instrumental colouring—unlike those numerous imitators of Wagner who, as has been aptly remarked, often assign to the human voice the part of a "schlecht gesetzte Mittelstimme." It has been said that this latest work of Ponchielli is heavy; if so, it is owing not to the music, but to the excessive length of an opera not very rich in dramatic situations. In truth the fault lies in the superabundance of music, in which declamation and recitative have an important share. This fault, however, may be easily remedied by judiciously curtailing the score.

The opera has no overture, but the few opening bars at once announce the lofty character of the music, the effect of the orchestra being that of an organ which accompanies the prayer of Ruben and Jefte at the Easter-offering.* This prayer is one of the gems of the opera; and the whole of the first and fourth acts are pervaded by the same characteristic Hebrew colouring which Halévy tried in the "Juive." Two numbers of great beauty, in the first act, are the trio between Amenofi, Azalee, and Nefte,† and the love duet between Azalee and Jefte,‡ as well as the finale or parting-scene, remarkable for its brilliant vocal and instrumental climax. The first orchestral movement in the second act is very original; and the Temple music which follows would be equally so if we were not rather reminded of

"Aïda" and Meyerbeer. Among the most luminous numbers in this act are a Barcarola, with sordina accompaniment, and Ruben's lamentation.* The rest of the second and the first part of the third act are composed chiefly of dances and marches, of which the former are very characteristic and novel, not to say eccentric. Amenofi has a pathetic air,† an excellent type of Ponchielli's peculiar style; and after a duet of great dramatic power between Amenofi and Jefte,‡ the climax of the opera is reached in the finale, when Azalee denounces the worship of Ilia the goddess. In this number, which is conceived and treated on a most elaborate scale, the whole artillery of instruments down to the sacred gong is brought into play. The fourth act is short, but the music is full of expression. The instrumental prelude is a most elegant and effective piece of writing, and withal of a style almost Handelian in its classical severity. After a duet between Azalee and Jefte,§ the opera is brought to a close by the introductory prayer of the first act, "E la Pasqua del Signor, Gloria, Gloria, Hosanna."

In spite of its length the "Figliuol Prodigo" was received with great enthusiasm; and, as regards the leading artists, the lion's share of the applause fell deservedly to Signor Tamagno, tenor (Azalee), Signor de Reszké, bass (Ruben), and Signora d'Angeri, soprano (Jefte). The parts of Amenofi (baritone) and Nefte (mezzo-soprano) were not adequately rendered; on the other hand, both the choruses and the orchestra were unexceptionable; and the success of the whole performance is in no small degree due to Signor Faccio, who, with Marino and Luigi Mancinelli, counts among the most masterly conductors in Italy.

It is impossible to appreciate and digest all the vocal and polyphonic merits of Ponchielli's music on a first hearing; but even the numbers which elicited immediate, and in places enthusiastic, applause attested the great value and beauty of a work which redounds to the glory of Ponchielli and to the honour of Italian art.

SOME interest has been excited by the appearance in Scribner's Magazine for February of an article giving the result of a careful study of the tone and rhythm of Niagara. The investigation was conducted by Mr. Eugene M. Thayer, a well-known American musician, whose thorough acquaintance with the organ added to considerable acoustical lore specially qualified him for the task. Mr. Thayer listened with a keen technical ear to what is often called the "roar" of the cataract, and concluded that it is no roar at all, but "a perfectly constructed musical tone—clear, definite, and unapproachable in its majestic perfection." Within the limits of a short note we cannot follow the investigator through the details of his work. Enough that having detected the harmonics of the mighty ground tone, he had no difficulty in determining the tone itself, which, we are told, is five octaves below G, first line, bass stave. On the same authority we learn that the pulse of the cataract beats just once per second, every third beat being accentuated, while each bar thus marked out is separable into twenty-seven weaker pulsations. Mr. Thayer, therefore, represents what he calls "the sublimest music on earth" by a mighty chord of the dominant seventh of C, based on GG, but to be read four octaves lower. A propos, in a little brochure entitled "Music and Mind and Musical Physics," by Dr. J. W. Bernhardt we find evidence of a similar inquiry addressed

* E la Pasqua del Signor. † E languir, Azalee.
‡ Negli occhi tuoi, non mi mentir.

* V' ha un figliuolo d' Israel.
† Inorridisci, il fremito.

‡ Raccoglie e calma.

to more commonplace phenomena. Contending that "all sounds come to us with some quality of beauty in them," Dr. Bernhardt says: "The sound of the rolling past of the cabs in the street I inhabit comes to my upper room as a definite and constant musical note. The resonance of the walls of the neighbouring houses, reinforced, focussed, and determined by the resonance of the room I work in, presents me constantly with the note called F in the fourth line in the bass, in combination with higher sounds clearly heard ringing in the air in charming relation to it, like a delicate accompaniment of distant soft violins to a fundamental bass." We are glad to match the investigation of the American musician with one on our own side, and, by-the-by, the fact that we have such "street music" always with us is another reason for banishing German bands and Italian hurdy-gurdies.

SIDE by side with those numerous institutions for bettering the physical condition of the poorer classes which characterise the present day, we are glad to see almost an equal number for improving their mental condition. Amongst these latter music holds a place of the utmost importance; for it has been fully proved that, as a relaxation, even "ragged school" children prefer a concert to any class of entertainment which can be placed before them. But in providing these humble feasts of music it is good to see not only that the fare is wholesome, but that it strengthens and invigorates the constitution. Our readers know that we have ever endeavoured to prove how thoroughly we miscalculate the taste of the multitude by playing low-class music in order to please them; and we have now to relate a case which strongly illustrates our position. At a recent musical entertainment got up by some zealous workers in the cause for the gratification of the waifs and strays under their care, after a simple and unoffending part-song had been tolerably well given by the little choir, one of the ladies who had promoted the concert turned to a costermonger at her side and asked him how he liked it. "Pretty well," he said, "but couldn't we have any better music; something of Mendelssohn's now?" "Why," said the lady, somewhat astonished, "do you know anything of Mendelssohn?" "Know anything of him," he replied, "I should think so; what I should like to hear would be something from 'Elijah' or 'St. Paul'; if we could have had 'O rest in the Lord' now, it would have been worth coming for." Will the ladies and gentlemen who so kindly undertake the trouble of organising these concerts take this little lesson to heart? We may think that we understand the kind of music with which the poorer classes most sympathise; but if we want any positive knowledge on the subject, let us not be above taking counsel of a costermonger.

WE have from time to time drawn the attention of our readers to some advertisements for accomplished musicians, who, in addition to the exercise of their artistic powers, shall also be enabled to make themselves generally useful in other capacities: a turnkey, for example, who can enliven the prison in which he is officially engaged with vocal music; or, an organist who can likewise perform the duties of village blacksmith. But the following advertisement opens out a somewhat novel path for musical executants:

WANTED IMMEDIATELY, a YOUNG LADY that can accompany on the Piano, and, if necessary, assist in waiting. Apply to—
Here, indeed, is an eligible opening for a pianoforte-player who has also an aptitude, and an ambition, for waiting at table. Yet we cannot but think that the advertisement should have been more explicit; for, as the two offices which the "young lady" will be called upon to fulfil are so widely distinct, it would be good to state at what part of the day she is to be a pianist and at what part a waiter. Then, again, is it to be understood that she is to "accompany" the guests during the dinner-hour (for the advertisement comes from an Inn), or to play the accompaniment of any song a lady or gentleman may feel inclined to try over? As it is evident that at the hotel from which this advertisement emanates music is one of the attractions, it may be assumed that there will be concerts occasionally in the drawing-room; and this is one of the reasons why we think it important that at a certain hour the artist should cease to be the servant; for, on the one hand, it would be awkward when waiting at dinner to be called upon to accompany a song, and, on the other hand, it would mar the effect of a song if the accompanist were suddenly to be summoned into the dining-room to change the plates.

REVIEWERS, both of literary and musical works, have strange experiences. Those devoted to the criticisms of books will doubtless remember a novel which, published as original, contained whole scenes extracted from a similar work by a popular author; and we can, from our own knowledge, assert that a song was issued and sent for notice the music of which was, note for note, from a well-known vocal piece by an artist who had made his fame long before the so-called composer of the more recent ballad had been even heard of. An incident which has lately occurred may probably account for this. It appears that an author having complained that somebody had written a story in a journal which was almost identical with one of his own, naturally made a complaint on the matter, and was told by the person who had thus borrowed his ideas, that "he had been in the habit of reading stories in magazines and passages from Macaulay, and then writing them out from memory for the purpose of acquiring style. This must, he thinks, have occurred with regard to the story in question, which he must have written down and then mistaken for his own." Now here is a reason which, rightly or wrongly, may be given forth by the many who in so wholesale a manner reproduce the musical phrases of those who have preceded them. A man, for example, arranges some words to a melody by Mendelssohn, to which he signs his name. The coincidence is observed, and we are then, perhaps, told that one of the tunes the composer had been studying "for the purpose of acquiring style he had unconsciously written down and mistaken for his own." If this plea, in justification of what we may mildly term "appropriation," should not be accepted, we must admit that at least it has the charm of novelty.

THOSE interested in the cause of musical education will be glad to find that the Royal Academy of Music has instituted examinations in the theory and practice of the art, not only for musical artists and teachers, but for students. We have long advocated the desirability of this step; for although there have latterly been many examination boards established from which those studying music, either as a profession or an accomplishment, might obtain written guarantees of proficiency, the prestige of an Institution which for upwards of half a century has educated and spread over the country such eminent vocal and instrumental artists could not be ignored; and the consequence was that the applications for certificates of approval from the Royal Academy of Music became so numerous that the action which has now been taken appeared almost imperative. The Metropolitan Examinations for musical artists and teachers will be held in London, the Board of Examiners consisting of three professors of the Institution; and the Local Examinations will take place in any centre where twelve or more candidates may present themselves through one of the local examiners, and in London at the Institution. It is possible that these examinations may prove more severe tests than any yet established; but the hope is that they may raise the status of education in this country by stimulating both professional and amateur students to fit themselves for the prescribed ordeal. We know that the announcement has already been most cordially received, both in London and the provinces; and have every reason to place implicit faith in the result.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE fifth Concert of the season took place on Thursday evening, the 17th ult., when Professor Macfarren's Oratorio "St. John the Baptist" was performed. Produced originally at the Bristol Festival in 1873, it has been but seldom performed in London, and thanks are due to Mr. Barnby, and those in authority at the Albert Hall, for giving London amateurs a further opportunity of becoming acquainted with one of the most musicianly works ever written by an Englishman. That "St. John the Baptist" will ever become what is called popular with the general public can scarcely be expected, for the present taste in art is for that which is quaint and exciting to the fancy. A solemn subject treated in a thoughtful, albeit an admirable manner, will probably be passed by with respectful commendation, but without that hearty applause and warm appreciation which it may thoroughly deserve. In Professor Macfarren's work, from first to last, the educated musician cannot but be struck with the skill and ingenuity with which the varied subjects are treated. The Overture is certainly one of the finest specimens of its order written in the present age. In the preface Dr. Macfarren says it is intended as a prologue suggesting the state of expectancy that preceded the Advent—the impatient longings of the Hebrews for the coming of the Messiah, and for the government He would establish. If the Overture be considered either as abstract, or what is called "programme" music, it is equally good, and may fairly be taken as a high type of English skill. Concerning the performance much happily can be said in praise. Occasionally a little hesitation was apparent in the choral numbers, but it must, however, be remembered that the choruses are mostly exceedingly difficult. Considerable time and patience must surely have been spent in their preparation, to have brought them to such an acceptable state. The sopranos and altos deserve special praise for their rendering of Chorus No. 8, "This is my beloved son"; unanimously encored, it was repeated in even a still more superior manner. The band was everything that could be desired, full in number and good in quality. The choice of soloists could hardly have been improved, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, receiving most hearty and prolonged applause on her appearance on the platform, sang in her best manner, and might have been justified in accepting the demand for an encore, for her facile and admirable delivery of the trying air, "I rejoice in my youth." Madame Patey discharged the somewhat thankless office of Narrator with all requisite dignity and power of expression. Mr. Edward Lloyd's part is not so effective as that usually given to the first tenor, but, by artistic treatment, he lifted the character of Herod into importance. Mr. Frederick King sustained the part of the titre-rôle in an eminently satisfactory manner. Not only was every phrase given with the greatest accuracy, but Mr. King showed a most intelligent appreciation of the force of the words that fell to his lot to deliver. Mr. Barnby exercised more than usual care, and deserves unstinted praise for an admirable performance.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THIS Society's second programme having been postponed on account of the great storm, its third was given, at what was actually the second Concert, on the 11th ult.

The event proved to be one of good augury for the old, but now, let us hope, rejuvenated association. There was a numerous and much interested audience; the performance could hardly have been better without unusual and almost impossible preparation, and at the head of the programme stood the latest example on a large scale of English sacred music. Something like the life and vigour appropriate to our foremost Oratorio Society animated the proceedings, therefore. Let us hope that subsequent experience may not show this to have been a mere flash in the pan. Against the choice of Mr. Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" not even those who think least highly of that production will expect us to say a word. It has often been charged against the Sacred Harmonic Society—and not without reason—that it neglects novelties of all kinds, but especially those which are the work of Englishmen. It has been urged, moreover, that the Society should, not less as a matter of policy than of principle, recognise such things and place itself in the van of progress without neglecting the masterpieces of bygone time. Remembering this, all who have complained in the past are under obligation now to acknowledge the fact that in so promptly bringing out the "Martyr of Antioch" the Society did well, and acted up to the duties of its position. As already stated, the performance, taken all round, was very good indeed. It wanted something of needful spirit and "grip," but that arose from Mr. Sullivan's method of conducting, and from the remarkable contrast between it and the method of Sir M. Costa. To borrow a figure from equitation, Mr. Sullivan always rides with a loose rein, whereas Sir Michael prefers to keep his horse well in hand with a sharp bit. Accustomed to the veteran's management, the orchestra and chorus could not quite make out the languid guidance of the younger man, and hence the result was not everything that could have been wished. This apart, no reason for complaint appeared. The band was, generally speaking, excellent, while the chorus, now so vastly improved, showed perfect acquaintance with their work and ability to do it the fullest justice. The soloists were those who took part in the first performance at Leeds, save that Mrs. Osgood appeared as the Martyr instead of Madame Albani. It may be imagined, therefore, that all was well in respect of the dramatis personæ. Mrs. Osgood, if less confident than at Brighton on a subsequent occasion, sang with high intelligence and feeling; Madame Patey gave the two contralto airs perfectly; Mr. Lloyd made his usual great success in the songs of the Roman Prefect, and Mr. King did all that was possible for the part of the Chief Priest. We need scarcely add that a good deal of the "sacred musical drama" was received with much favour, or that, at the close, Mr. Sullivan was recalled to be fervently applauded. A fine performance of the "Lobgesang," conducted by Sir M. Costa, brought the Concert to an end.

Sir Michael's Oratorio "Naaman" was performed on the 25th ult. Of this we must reserve particulars.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE resumption of the Saturday Concerts after the usual Christmas interval, on the 5th ult., was noticeable for the commencement of a series of performances of the whole of Schubert's symphonies, some of which, it is morally certain, had never previously been played in public, or probably even tried over. That these works do not as a whole possess the same interest as the nine symphonies of Beethoven is easily to be accounted for by the fact that most of them were the productions of Schubert's youthful days. Only two (the unfinished symphony in B minor, No. 8, and the great one in C major, No. 9) date from his riper period, and show us the composer in the full maturity of his powers. Yet, while the interest attaching to the revival of these early works is largely a historical one, there is sufficient intrinsic merit in them to justify their being at least occasionally heard. The first symphony, in D major, written when Schubert was not quite seventeen years old, is a remarkable work for a mere boy; but so far as concerns either the ideas or the treatment, it shows little originality, the influence of Mozart and Haydn being traceable in every page. It is a significant fact that the most individuality is noticeable in the instrumentation—a branch of his art for which Schubert seems to have had a natural genius, as witness his "Rosamunde" music, his later symphonies, and his Mass in E flat. This is the more surprising when it is remembered that the composer had but few, if any, opportunities of bringing to the test of hearing the combinations which he had conceived. Of this first symphony the finale is the most striking movement; but the whole work abounds in pleasing melody, and is excellently put together. The other orchestral numbers at this concert were the overture to "Der Freischütz" and two pleasing little pieces by H. Hofmann, from his "Italian Love-story." They were originally written as piano duets, and subsequently scored for orchestra by the composer. Mr. Eugène D'Albert, a pupil of the National Training School for Music at South Kensington, made his first appearance at the Crystal Palace, giving a most remarkable performance of Schumann's Concerto for piano. Not only was the mechanical finish perfect, but there was an amount of musical feeling and an intelligent appreciation of the composer's meaning very rare in one so young. The performance excited the greatest enthusiasm, and very naturally. Mr. Santley was the vocalist.

On the following Saturday (the 12th) the Concert commenced with Schubert's second symphony, in B flat. This work had been once before heard at Sydenham (in October, 1877), and the present was the second performance at the Saturday Concerts. What has been said above of the first symphony may be repeated of the present work, which was composed between December, 1814, and March, 1815. As in the first symphony, so here, the finale is the most important movement, overflowing with life and fire, and with its persistent dactylic rhythm foreshadowing the finale of the great Trio in B flat produced many years later. The very original and somewhat eccentric ballet-music from Rubinstein's "Nero" was another novelty in this afternoon's programme. Herr Ignaz Brüll was the pianist and brought forward an early work of his own—his first Concerto, Op. 10. The piece is not remarkable for originality, and Herr Brüll's playing, though sound, is in no way striking; consequently neither the pianist nor the composition created a deep impression. The vocalist at this concert was Mr. Herbert Reeves, who, by his thoroughly artistic singing, justified the favourable judgment passed on him at his first public appearance last season.

Schubert's third symphony, given on the 19th, which, like the first, is in D major, shows a great advance on its two predecessors. Though only a few months later in date than the second, it is not only a more mature, but a more original work. The first movement is charming throughout, the second is full of simple grace, and most melodious; while the finale is again masterly, and may be compared (though at a long interval) with the finale of the great symphony in C. The programme of this concert included also Beethoven's symphony in F, though it is difficult to see why two symphonies should be given on one afternoon. Miss Helen Hopekirk, a very excellent and artistic pianist, brought forward an extremely dry and uninteresting Concertstück by Reinecke: the applause which she received at the close was certainly due to the player and not to the music. Two charming little Hungarian dances from Brahms's latest set, were given at this concert, and pleased greatly. The vocalists were Miss Damian and Signor Foli.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE Concert of January 31 included two novelties, viz., a Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 5) by Mr. Davenport, and a series of Variations for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 39) by Herr F. Wüllner. The latter composer, whose name is scarcely yet known in this country, occupies a leading position in his native Germany, where his compositions have found much favour. The variations in question furnish ample proof of a versatile talent, refinement of taste, and excellent musicianlike workmanship, and being played by Mdle. Marie Krebs and Signor Piatti, we need not add that they were admirably rendered. Mr. Davenport, it will be remembered, favourably introduced himself to the English public by a symphony which some few years ago gained a prize at the Alexandra Palace. The new Trio, which adheres more or less to the orthodox form, is well written, the sprightly and vivacious Allegro evidently pleasing the most, and the performance on the part of Mdle. Krebs, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti, must have satisfied even the most exacting demands of the young composer. Mdle. Marie Krebs gave moreover a capital rendering of Bach's Pianoforte Prelude and Fugue "Alla Tarantella." Spohr's Quartet in A major (Op. 93) was likewise included in the evening's proceedings. Mr. Harper Kearton was the vocalist.

At the first Concert of last month (the 7th ult.) Herr Ignaz Brüll was the pianist, and gave, as his solo performance, a very efficient and refined rendering of Chopin's Barcarole in F sharp minor (Op. 60), which was much applauded. Another instrumental solo was contributed by Madame Norman-Néruda who played (for the eighth time at these Concerts) the Sarabande and Tambourin from Leclair's Violin Sonata in D major. Admirably performed though it was by the gifted lady violinist, it must be admitted that the work possesses but little musical interest beyond that which the antiquarian would derive from it. The Concert opened with Verdi's String Quartet in E minor, executed by Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Straus, and Piatti; and concluded with Herr Brüll's Pianoforte Trio in E flat (Op. 14), performed here for the first time, in the execution of which the composer was associated with Madame Norman-Néruda and Signor Piatti. With regard to the latter work we must reserve our opinion until we have had an opportunity of hearing it a second time, when, perhaps, much that appeared to us trite as regards leading themes, and overstrained as regards elaboration, may be better appreciated. Mdle. Friedländer contributed songs by Chopin, Schubert, and Brüll respectively, in which she was deservedly applauded.

The second Concert (on the 14th ult.) commenced with a capital performance of Beethoven's String Quartet in C minor (Op. 18, No. 4), admirably led by Herr Jean Becker, who was assisted by MM. L. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. Later in the evening the eminent violinist was also associated with Mdle. Marie Krebs and Signor Piatti in the production of Spohr's Pianoforte Trio in E minor (Op. 119), which was rendered con amore. The lady pianist played, as her solo performance, three pieces by Searlatti, and, in conjunction with Signor Piatti, a Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello in B flat by Röntgen. Mr. Thorndike contributed vocal solos.

On the succeeding Monday (the 21st ult.) one of the "events" of the season, looked forward to annually with eager and, if possible, increasing interest by the frequenters of this institution, viz., the arrival of Herr Joachim, was once more realised, his appearance on the platform being, as usual, the signal for prolonged and almost deafening applause. The great violinist made his début this year in Beethoven's Quartet in C sharp minor (Op. 132), one of the so-called "posthumous," which mark the composer's last and most profound period of abstract creative activity, and in the interpretation of which Herr Joachim has scarcely a rival. Assisted as he was by such artists as MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti, the result could not fail to be otherwise than eminently satisfactory, and was as such appreciated by the crowded audience. Other numbers in the programme were the same composer's Pianoforte Sonata in E major (Op. 109), played with her usual taste and technical skill by Mdle. Marie Krebs; and Haydn's bright and melodious String Quartet in G major (Op. 17, No. 5), executed by the quartet party already referred to. Herr Joachim, in conclusion, delighted the audience, in conjunction with the lady pianist, by the performance of four of the new set of Hungarian Dances, written by Herr Brahms for two pianofortes, and arranged for violin and pianoforte by his friend, the executant violinist, as had been the case with the preceding set of these characteristic dances, with which the public at these Concerts has long since become familiar. Mr. Oswald's fine baritone voice and good training, was again manifested in songs by Carissimi and Gounod.

Madame Schumann, after an absence of several years from this country, was announced to make her appearance again here on the 28th ult.

MR. HALLÉ'S CONCERTS.

ENCOURAGED by the favourable reception given to his Manchester orchestra last season, and, no doubt, by the success of Berlioz' "Damnation de Faust," as performed with a London orchestra and chorus more recently, Mr. Charles Hallé began a series of four Concerts in St. James's Hall on the 5th ult. The attendance at the outset was decidedly not such as those interested in the result could have expected or wished; but something of this must be set down to disagreeable weather, and much more, perhaps, to the fact that the programme did not contain any novelty adapted to excite general interest. Many persons may have been kept away, too, by the absence of vocal music. Connoisseurs of orchestral works notoriously complain that songs should be mixed up with symphonies and overtures, but they go and hear all the same; whereas lovers of vocal music do not go and hear where their favourite pabulum is denied. On the whole, Mr. Hallé might do worse than throw in a singer on future occasions. The opening Concert began with the Overture to "Oberon," throughout which the remarkable ensemble of the orchestra was strikingly shown. Our musical friends in Lancashire must not deceive themselves with the belief that London amateurs unreservedly praise Mr. Hallé's fine band. We have a better amongst ourselves, and it may be heard every Saturday just now at the Crystal Palace. There is hardly any comparison between the "wind" of the two orchestras. No doubt the excellence of Mr. Hallé's trombones and of his clarinet must be granted, but his oboe is little short of distressing, and the ensemble of the "wind" lacks the refinement and perfect balance of that at Sydenham. But the style in which Mr. Hallé's artists work together as a whole is surpassed by no orchestra in this country, wherefore, in common with all metropolitan lovers of good music, we give to their every appearance amongst us the hearty welcome assuredly justified on this occasion by an almost electrifying performance of Weber's overture. The capacity of the band was further shown in Goldmark's so-called Symphony, "A Rustic Wedding," the most decided approach to novelty in the programme. This work was noticed by us shortly after its recent production at the Crystal Palace; and a reference to what was then said obviates the necessity for renewed discussion. The various movements were somewhat coldly received; not, as we imagine, through positive dissatisfaction with the music so much as because, looking at the title of the work, the audience were unable to decide the connection between a rustic wedding and its professed illustration. Herein is the weakness of "programme music." It can never stand alone, because the same musical language may express to a thousand different hearers as many different things—unless, of course, it descend to the imitation of such natural sounds as the cry of the cuckoo or the roar of a tempest. Programme music needs the aid of words, and this was what Mr. Hallé refused his audience, the bills put into their hands not even specifying the movements. Necessarily, therefore, the Symphony was heard at a serious disadvantage, the attention which should have been given to it being distracted by puzzled guesses at what it was all about. It was, however, splendidly played. Every man seemed to be on his mettle, and exceedingly few weak points marred the perfection of the result. Beethoven's Symphony in C minor did not fare so well. Familiarity with the task may have induced a measure of carelessness in its discharge; but whatever the cause, neither the general reading of the work nor the details of performance came up to expectation. Mr. Hallé, we cannot but think, took all the movements, the second especially, faster than was desirable; while the Scherzo lost, through other causes, much of its effect. The Entr'acte in B flat and Ballet Air from "Rosamunde" (Schubert) enabled the orchestra to retrieve its laurels, and the Concert ended triumphantly with the Overture to "Tannhäuser."

At the second Concert, on the 19th ult., Goldmark's Symphony was repeated, but the interest and curiosity of the audience gathered round other things, one of these being Beethoven's "Triple" Concerto (Op. 56) for violin (Madame Néruda), violoncello (Signor Piatti), and piano (Mr. Hallé). We are glad, on account of accuracy, to be able to state that this performance was not announced as "first time in England" or even as "first time in London." The Triple Concerto had previously been heard in connection with the daily concerts at the Royal Albert Hall, December 9, 1874, the executants on that occasion being Miss May, M. Sainton, and Signor Piatti. We the more insist upon this fact because the work done at the Albert Hall is very often overlooked. In the advertisements of the Philharmonic Concert given on the 24th ult., for example, it was stated that Berlioz' Overture to "Waverley" would be performed "for the first time in England." But reference to the programmes of the Exhibition Concerts at South Kensington in 1873 shows that this very work was produced there midway in the season. Misstatements of such a kind are unpardonable, even though they—as we believe—are not willfully made. There can be no excuse for attempting to gain the credit of enterprise by reckless assertion, or for neglecting to search the records of past years lest injustice should be done to previous labourers in the same honourable field. Reverting to Beethoven's Concerto, it may occasion wonder that a piece presumably so important is so seldom heard. But the Concerto, albeit written in 1804, the year of the "Eroica," is by no means fully characteristic of its author, to whose first manner it undoubtedly belongs. Indeed, so roccoco—for Beethoven—is the entire work, that we are driven to suspect the master as having written it for a particular purpose. Anyhow, it is hard to trace on any of its pages the miracle-working hand that produced the Symphony in E flat. It will readily be assumed that the competent artists engaged in its execution did full justice to their theme, and that the rarely heard strains were listened to with the interest rightfully demanded by every scrap of tune that Beethoven left behind him. A subsequent performance of the orchestral Serenade written by Mozart in 1776 to celebrate the marriage of Fraulein Haffner (or Heffner), was boldly announced as "first time in London," and, though strongly disposed to doubt, we are not able to contest the assertion. Mozart, then just arrived at manhood, composed this work for strings, oboes, horns, bassoons, and trumpets; preceding it, in honour of the same occasion, with a Nuptial March in the same key (D) for the same combination of instruments. Fraulein Haffner was, it appears, the sister of a friend and correspondent of the composer, added to which her father occupied a distinguished position as one of the most patriotic citizens of Salzburg, to say nothing of his being a bürgermeister. Various sentiments, therefore, inspired the zeal which led Mozart to celebrate with such earnestness a purely domestic event. The Serenade consists of eight movements—that is to say, Allegro maestoso (D), Andante (G), Minuet (G minor), Rondo (G minor), Minuet (D), Andante (A), Minuet (D), Adagio leading to Allegro assai (D). All these are distinctly in the well-known early manner of the master, the only special feature being the introduction of a solo violin—played at St. James's Hall by Madame Néruda. That every movement is full of charm and interest to lovers of pure music need not be said; and Mr. Hallé is entitled to the thanks of amateurs for rescuing from undeserved oblivion so good an example of the divine composer. We shall have entire credit when we add that the second Concert of the series was more attractive than the first. Next month it will be our duty to speak of something more interesting still—the performance on Saturday last of Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ."

MR. KUHE'S MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

THE first thing to be noticed in connection with the eleventh celebration of this Festival is its brevity. For years past Mr. Kuhe has carried on the performances through the greater part of two weeks, whereas now he limits himself to one. The change, I am bound to say, has an ominous look. An enterprise which shrinks into a smaller compass is not usually in a flourishing state; and the probabilities are that Mr. Kuhe finds local rivalry, and the multiplication of more or less good concerts everywhere around him, an increasingly formidable obstacle. That the Festival will cease and determine altogether is not likely at present; but when it does reach the limit of its existence there will be genuine cause for regret. Mr. Kuhe has always shown a disposition to advance the cause of his art by producing new works, and preferentially the works of English composers. In this manner he has not only stimulated effort among those who, as a rule, meet with little encouragement, but made a graceful return for the hospitality extended to him during many years by the country of his adoption. That I have not now to record the production of an important novelty is a matter scarcely to be laid at the door of the enterprising manager. Arrangements had been made, it is said, with Mr. Barnby for a composition, but as that gentleman's engagements did not permit him to discharge the task in time, there was nothing for it but to garnish the programme with whatever comparatively new thing seemed to promise best. In the result few, perhaps, indulged a mood of complaint, though there may have been some disappointment.

LONDON: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

BOSTON, NEW YORK, AND PHILADELPHIA: DITSON AND CO.

The Festival preparations were much of the same character as those which served in previous years. There was, for example, an orchestra of nearly fifty performers, mostly well-known London artists, with Mr. Carrodus at their head; the chorus was furnished by the body of amateurs known as Mr. Kuhe's Festival Choir, under Mr. A. King, Mus. Bac.; the solo vocalists were a number of well-known and favourite artists—whose names will appear below;—and the duties of conductor devolved upon Mr. Kuhe himself, assisted by others from time to time. I need only add, as to this matter, that the orchestra, in firm hands, was good enough for anything, and that the chorus showed a marked improvement upon its former doings. Mr. King is evidently training his voices with the patience and skill necessary to secure the high reward at which it may be assumed he aims.

A large number of persons from Brighton and adjacent towns attended the opening Concert on Tuesday, the 15th ult., attracted by the announcement of Mr. Sullivan's new sacred musical drama, "The Martyr of Antioch," with the author conducting in person. Mr. Sullivan had the right to account himself, on this occasion, a fortunate man. Not only did the public take an interest in his work, but gave him warm applause before they had heard a note of it. Then the soloists were, with a single exception, those who helped to secure a great triumph at Leeds when the "drama" was first produced, while the chorus—the orchestra was, of course, tolerably safe—acquitted itself better than, perhaps, the most sanguine expected. After the extended criticism of the "Martyr of Antioch," which appeared in these columns à propos to its first performance, there is no need for remark upon the character and claims of the work. I have nothing to add and nothing to retract. What was strength then and what was weakness then appear to me strength and weakness now; so that the verdict comparing it to the image, partly of metal and partly of clay, which Nebuchadnezzar the king saw in his dream stands for good and all. The effect upon the audience was precisely what might have been anticipated. Warm applause greeted the bright and tuneful Pagan hymns and the funeral anthem of the Christians, but the more dramatic episodes met with little response. In them Mr. Sullivan skims the surface of his argument with a trivial hand, and it is not to be expected that he can reach, through work done thus, the inner being of those to whom he appeals. The soloists were as successful as the character of their respective parts allowed. Mrs. Osgood did full justice to the music of the martyr priestess, and entered into the dramatic situation with a fervour scarcely expected. Her delivery of Margarita's address to the persecutors, and the triumphant song at the stake, was a really admirable effort, quite worthy the liberal applause it received. In the beautiful air, "The love-sick maiden," not less than in the very different "Io Pæan," Madame Patey repeated the success she won at Leeds. The first of these calls for special qualities both in taste and skill, but our accomplished contralto met every demand, and gave to the music a charm which, mayhap, lies within her power alone. Mr. Lloyd's triumph in "Come, Margarita, come" was assured, but, strangely enough, the Prefect's second song met with almost equal favour, though he sang the first in a style which might have provoked the very stones to cry "Encore." Mr. Cross as the Bishop and Mr. King as the High Priest, had somewhat thankless duties, but discharged them with care, and earned a right to recognition. At the close loud applause induced Mr. Sullivan to return twice and acknowledge the favourable reception his work had met with. The "Martyr of Antioch" was followed by a selection of sacred music comprising Gounod's "By Babylon's wave" and "Nazareth"; the concert ending with the "Hallelujah" from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives."

On Wednesday morning a "classical concert" took place under the direction of Mr. Manns, whose practised skill with the bâton almost guaranteed success in advance. The Crystal Palace conductor received a round of applause as he took his place, and proceeded to justify his reception by an excellent rendering of Beethoven's "Leonora" overture. Marked both by spirit and delicacy, this effort showed what the orchestra could do, and not less what many amateurs in the cheaper seats could appreciate, loud and long clapping of hands in that quarter following the last chord. Two orchestral pieces respectively by M. Massenet and M. Saint-Saëns were next given. Of these the first, entitled "Le dernier Sommeil de la Vierge," and played with muted strings, is decidedly melodious and pleasing, if not otherwise remarkable. It charmed the audience greatly, and had to be repeated. M. Saint-Saëns's piece occurs as the "Dance of Priestesses and Bacchanalia" in his "Samson and Delilah." Any one who knows the proclivities of the composer can easily imagine what this dance is like; but to others no language could convey more than a faint idea. A common expression of confusion and uproar is found in the words "Pandemonium broke loose," and this aptly applies to the French author's work. In saying so I do not intend reproach. The Philistine priestesses, most likely, danced to even more cacophonous strains; but whether they did or not, it is unwise to take such a character-piece out of connection and offer it to criticism without dramatic surroundings. The next instrumental work was a Concert Piece for piano and orchestra, written by Mr. Walter Macfarren expressly for this occasion, and conducted by the composer. Mr. Macfarren, it need hardly be said, took the audience back into the purer regions of classic art, where, by force of training and sympathy, he dwells. The work, though not remarkable for highly original qualities, is in excellent taste and style. Its themes are melodious, its development shows happy and graceful fancy, while, though the pianoforte part is not especially prominent, the share it takes in the ensemble cannot be otherwise than grateful to the executant. That the new Concertstick must be heard more than once for a full appreciation of its qualities I readily concede, nevertheless there is little danger in at once giving a verdict generally favourable. Mr. Macfarren, who was applauded, conducted with natural anxiety for the result, and the solo part met with an able and zealous executant in Miss Kuhe. The choice of Spohr's Dramatic Concerto as a "battle-horse" for Mr. Carrodus was, I believe, not that of the eminent violinist himself, otherwise, perhaps, something less hackneyed and more congenial to the audience would have been chosen. It served, all the same, to display our English artist's very great ability, which, let me add, is now more than ever recognised. Mr. Carrodus, like all people of his nation who follow music and are not vocalists, has had an uphill fight, but the "pegging away," recommended in another line of action by President Lincoln, is gaining him the victory. The "Danse des Sylphes" and "Hungarian March" from Berlioz' "Faust" were given unequally, the first-named suffering much and making little effect, but in Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser" the orchestra made ample amends. Miss Hope Glenn, the only vocalist engaged at this Concert, sang songs by Handel, G. A. Macfarren, and Balfe, much to the satisfaction of her audience.

Sir M. Costa's "Eli" occupied the Concert hours of Thursday evening, Mr. Kuhe conducting in the unaccustomed absence of the composer, and the solo parts being sustained by Miss Robertson, Miss Orridge, Mr. Maas, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Signor Foli. So familiar is this work to Brighton executants and Brighton that lengthy comment would be waste of time and space. I shall not be expected to say that Mr. Kuhe's zeal to do well made up for the loss of Sir M. Costa's skill and power of command. Indeed the ensemble left somewhat to desire; on the other hand Miss Robertson made a mark in Hannah's jubilant air; Miss Orridge gained general sympathy by her unaffected rendering of Samuel's two Prayers, Mr. Maas roused tremendous excitement by his stirring delivery of the Philistine war-song, and Mr. Lewis Thomas and Signor Foli, as respectively the Man of God and Eli, did their work as such competent artists might have been expected to do it. The favourite duet for the two basses was, I may add, one of the most decided "hits" of the evening. Not often are two voices of a quality now as rare as it is genuine heard together.

The Concert given on Friday night for Mr. Kuhe's "benefit" may be dismissed in a few words. It appealed to what musicians mournfully know as "popular" tastes, and included a liberal allowance of songs and ballads. But the programme contained more than a slight flavour of higher excellence. In it, for example, were Hérold's Overture to "Le Pré aux Clercs," two small pianoforte pieces by Raff, and the pretty Suite de Ballet, "Language of the Flowers," by Mr. F. H. Cowen, who conducted its performance. I should add that an organ solo—Fantasia on "Home, sweet home," and "Rule Britannia" (Guilmant)—was introduced between the parts, though why the "king of instruments" and Mr. Crapps should have been placed in such an ignoble position I cannot make out. Do organs, organ music, and organists make up a group of poor relations? The vocalists at this Concert were the Misses Robertson and Mr. Santley. On Saturday the Festival ended with "Elijah," principal solos by Madame Sherrington, Madame Sterling, Mr. McGuckin, and Mr. Santley, Mr. Kuhe acting as conductor. About the performance, necessarily familiar in its general merit, of a work so well known nothing requires to be said, but looking back upon the entire proceedings, let me express a hope that Mr. Kuhe feels encouraged by their result to go on with his annual enterprise. That he has made such perseverance a matter of concern to art is one of his greatest claims upon sympathy and support.

BRIGHTON AQUARIUM CONCERTS.

We have sincere pleasure in noticing the resumption of these Concerts at the close of a Christmas "recess," the length of which was probably determined by that of the Brighton scholastic "vacation." It will be remembered that four performances were given in November and December; the fifth took place on the 5th ult., the sixth on the 8th ult., the seventh on the 19th ult., and the last of the series on the 27th ult. The question now is whether the Directors feel encouraged to persevere in their enterprise. We hope, and have some reason to believe they do, inasmuch as they officially announced that the series would be continued in February "in consequence of the great success" previously obtained. There can hardly have been a falling off since, but even assuming this untoward event, we contend that the experiment has not yet had time. Concerts of a high class are not, as a rule, popularised in one season or in two, and hasty conclusions on the part of the managers may really involve the throwing away of a splendid opportunity. Mr. Corder, who is more and more showing himself qualified for the highest work incidental to his position, deserves congratulation upon the eclectic character of his programmes, and especially for now avoiding an undue proportion of so-called "advanced" music. The programmes give no cause whatever for complaint, and very little for suggestion. Their contents are rich and varied enough to satisfy the most critical. To show this we will briefly notice the salient features of each of those presented last month.

On the 5th, Beethoven's Symphony in F (No. 8) was the principal piece; associated with it being Spohr's Dramatic Concerto for violin, played by Signor Papini; Gounod's overture to "The Mock Doctor"; and Mr. F. H. Cowen's overture and incidental music to "The Maid of Orleans." The symphony, owing to the improved "balance" of the orchestra, was heard to great advantage, and, if Signor Papini was not absolutely faultless in Spohr's work, his rendering of two smaller pieces excited great enthusiasm. Vocal music came well to the front on this occasion, the artists being Mdle. Bauermeister, Miss Emilie Lloyd, Mr.

Pearson, and Mr. Fox. At the next Concert, amateurs were regaled with Schumann's Symphony in B flat (No. 1), Massenet's "Scènes Pittoresques," Liszt's arrangement for piano and orchestra of Weber's grand Polonaise, and Reissiger's overture, "Die Felsenmühle"; Mdle. Krebs being the pianist, and Madame Edith Wynne the vocalist. The Polonaise solo was brilliantly played by the German pianist, who also gave her late father's well-known "Octave Study," and made with it a sensation even more marked. Of the orchestral music it is only necessary to say that Schumann's work put the resources of Mr. Corder's instrumentalists to a severe test, without causing them to fail. On the 19th the following important compositions were given: Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (Signor Papini), Saint-Saëns's Orchestral Suite in D, and Mozart's Symphony in E flat. Clearly this was a heavy day for the orchestra, but the strain did not prove too great, and the result must have satisfied all reasonable expectations. Two short solos played by Signor Papini were extremely well received, but that gentleman's rendering of Mendelssohn's Concerto was a somewhat eccentric performance. The vocalist, Mrs. Osgood, sang with her usual success. As regards the final Concert, we can only mention that the programme included Wagner's Overture "Tannhäuser," Liszt's "Fantaisie Hongroise" for piano (Mr. Coenen) and orchestra, Mr. Corder's orchestral Scene "The Passing of Arthur," and Schubert's Symphony in C (No. 9).

Our purpose in giving the above details has not been criticism so much as the making known an enterprise, which, by its character and consistent management, deserves the recognition of amateurs everywhere and the cordial support of all who are in a position to help it.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

At Mr. Hallé's Concert, on January 27, Mr. F. H. Cowen's Symphony in C minor, a musical reflex of his Scandinavian tour, which entitles Mr. Cowen to high rank amongst the composers of the day, was given for the first time. The performance was excellent, and at its conclusion Mr. Cowen, who, though present, did not conduct, was loudly cheered. Raff's pleasing trifle, "The Mill," a scherzo for stringed instruments, was also a novelty. Mr. Hallé played, in his best style, Mozart's pianoforte Concerto in B flat, No. 15; and Miss Minnie Hauk gave "My strength is spent" and "I'll give myself to no one" from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," and songs by Thomas and Beethoven. At the Gentlemen's Concerts—the oldest existing musical institution here—on January 31, the Symphony was Haydn's Surprise; Miss Kate Ockleston evinced technical and intellectual abilities of a high order in her performance of Chopin's pianoforte Concerto in E minor, and smaller pieces by Schumann and Raff; and Madame Trebelli and Miss Anna Williams contributed several songs. At Mr. Hallé's Concert, on the 3rd ult., Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given, the vocalists being Mdle. Breidenstein, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley. The latter gentleman gave his usual fine rendering of the bass music, and Madame Patey and Mr. Maas were both highly successful in their respective parts. Mdle. Breidenstein, who has a sweet but not powerful voice, was not an ideal exponent of the soprano music. Her style is spasmodic, and her pronunciation of English is at present singularly defective. The choruses and accompaniments were exceedingly well rendered; the double quartet, "For He shall give His angels," was however marred by badly balanced parts and a most inaccurate attack. At Mr. De Jong's Concert on the 5th ult., Miss Clara Samuëll, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli were all successful in their selections, and Mr. James Lowe gave an excellent reading of two movements of Prout's Organ Concerto in E minor. Mozart's clever musical joke, "The Village Musicians," given a month previously for the first time, was repeated by desire. The Manchester Vocal Society gave its fifth Concert of the season on the 9th ult., when the first part of the programme was devoted to part-music by local composers. The choir did not, on this occasion, quite maintain its usual high standard of excellence. At Mr. Hallé's Concert on the 10th ult., Herr Ignaz Brüll played his own pianoforte Concerto in F, and pieces by Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Brahms, with excellent effect, and Schumann's fine Symphony in D minor and Brüll's somewhat fantastic overture to "Macbeth" were the principal orchestral works. Miss Clara Samuëll and Mr. Frank Boyle were the vocalists. The former fully maintained her high reputation, and the latter increased the favourable impression made by his singing here a few weeks previously.—On the 17th ult., Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, and Mozart's Notturmo for four small stringed orchestras with two horns each, given for the first time in England, were the instrumental features. The latter, composed in the year 1776, is so scored that the second, third, and fourth orchestras are echoes of the first and of each other. The first orchestra enunciates a theme, the second repeats the latter half, the third re-echoes the concluding phrase, and the fourth repeats the two final bars. The work consists of three movements, each of which possesses intrinsic merit, apart from the novelty of construction. Mr. Hallé gave an exceptionally fine reading of Beethoven's Sonata Pastorale, the Andante in particular being played with unsurpassable delicacy and finish. Madlle. Orgeni, a soprano of some reputation in Vienna, made her first appearance here. She vocalises with considerable facility, but her voice—the remains of a fine organ—is worn and thin, and her style eccentric to grotesqueness.—Mr. De Jong gave the last Concert of his series on the 19th ult. Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. King were all very successful in their rendering of sundry popular songs and ballads, and Mr. De Jong gave a flute solo in his usual inimitable style.

THE REID FESTIVAL AT EDINBURGH.

THIS yearly Musical Festival, which, thanks to the activity and perseverance of Sir Herbert Oakeley, has acquired an importance which General Reid himself could never have anticipated, commenced on the 11th ult. The arrangements were much the same as in former years, Mr. Hallé bringing his admirable orchestra from Manchester, and being accompanied by Madame Norman-Néruda. The vocalists were Mdle. Marie Breidenstein and Mr. Joseph Maas. The programme included Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Mendelssohn's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra (finely played by Mr. Charles Hallé), and Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." Vieux-temps Adagio and Rondo in E were artistically rendered by Madame Norman-Néruda, although it might have been wished that she had selected a work more worthy of her talents. The entr'acte and ballet music from Cherubini's Opera, "Ali Baba," produced when the author was seventy-three years of age, were very well played, as was Macfarren's masterly Overture to "Chevy Chase." Mdle. Breidenstein is evidently a finished musician, and gave most intelligent renderings of all her songs; but her voice is scarcely strong enough for the hall when accompanied by the orchestra. Possibly it was for this reason that she was most successful in Schubert's song "Die junge Nonne," which was beautifully accompanied by Mr. Hallé. Mr. Maas sang his two songs—"Fra poco," from "Lucia," and "Ah, si ben mio," from the "Trovatore"—admirably; the last won an encore, to which he responded with a song from "Don Pasquale."

The second of the two Concerts arranged by Professor Oakeley, by way of addition to the Reid Festival Concert, took place on Saturday morning, the 12th ult., in the Music Hall, which was crowded in every part. The concert began with Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille" Overture, which was excellently rendered. The Symphony was Haydn's in E flat, and the programme included Beethoven's "Namensfeier" Overture (Op. 115, C major), Svendsen's second "Rhapsodie Norvégienne" (evidently intended as a musical expression of the wild scenery and sounds of rugged Norway), and Rossini's Overture to "Otello." Mr. Hallé played Mozart's B flat Concerto (No. 15) and three pianoforte solos by Heller. These so delighted the audience that the performer was enthusiastically encoored, and repeated the last of them. Mdle. Breidenstein sang, with much effect, the solo "Dich theure Halle," from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," and two lieder by Franz and Büchner, the "Frühlingslied" (Büchner) being unanimously encoored. Mr. Maas sang the aria "Più bianca," from Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," with viola obbligato, played by Herr Bernhardt; and subsequently the recitative and air, "Lend me your aid," from Gounod's lyric tragedy "La Reine de Saba." Both selections were admirably rendered.

The forty-first Concert in commemoration of General Reid, the founder of the Chair of Music in the University of Edinburgh, was held on the 14th ult. in the Music Hall, which was fully attended. The Concert was opened with the time-honoured excerpts from the compositions of the founder, the audience, according to the old custom, standing up during the performance of the spirited March "The Garb of Gaul." The programme, as a whole, was the most interesting of the three that have been given this year, and included Beethoven's Symphony in A (No. 7), Mozart's Overture "Il Flauto Magico," some selections from "Sylvia" by Léo Délibes, and the March from "Tannhäuser" amongst the orchestral pieces. Madame Néruda played Spohr's 12th Concerto (in A) for violin and orchestra, and in the second part a Sarabande and Tambourin by Léchir, the latter piece being very quaint. The performance of Goetz's Concerto in B flat, by Mr. Hallé, was one of the principal features of the Concert, and he was warmly applauded after each movement. Mdle. Breidenstein sang Mendelssohn's "Un-glücksel'ge," Schumann's "Aufträge," and a "Wiegeliied," by Taubert; Mr. Maas gave Handel's "Sound an alarm," from "Judas Maccabæus," and in the second part two songs by Sir Herbert Oakeley. Both these songs are excellent. The first, "Farewell," is a charming setting of Byron's well-known words, and was first sung by Mr. Sims Reeves at one of the Worcester Festivals. The "Troubadour's Song" was originally published as a chorus for mixed voices, and then reset for male voices, and sung at one of the University concerts. It is most spirited, and was so effective that, late as it was, Mr. Maas had to sing it again. We must, in conclusion, congratulate Sir Herbert Oakeley in having added another genuine success to the long roll of Reid Festivals given under his auspices. We understand that the students both of Aberdeen and of St. Andrew's Universities have requested Sir Herbert Oakeley to assist at their annual Concerts given in March and April.

MR. PAUER ON DRAWING-ROOM MUSIC.

ON the afternoon of the 17th ult. Mr. Ernst Pauer delivered the first of a course of two lectures at the Royal Institution on the "History of Drawing-room Music." Mr. Pauer attributed the creation of that description of music to the influence of amateurs, which he described as sometimes baneful, but not necessarily so; and, at all events, amateurs, he gave us to understand, as a class, were useful, if only as affording the means of subsistence to professors. A few of the bygone musicians wrote naturally in a light style suited to the taste of the unprofessional mind; others would lower even their naturally light style so as to increase the circle of their clients, and thus bestow on trifling compositions a higher commercial value; but many great musicians, Mr. Pauer reminded us, have worthily condescended to please their patrons with refined melodies and exquisite harmonies in those lesser musical forms adapted to the mechanical capabilities of the non-professional classes, and to the ordinary musical instruments and æsthetical requirements of family life. Amongst the finer examples of that style of music Mr. Pauer instanced the modestly called "Bagatelles" of Beethoven. But in his first lecture Mr. Pauer confined his illustrations to a historical period, extending from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to the first half of the eighteenth, that is to say, from Dr. John Bull and Orlando Gibbons to Scarlatti, Corelli, Rameau, the Couperins, Handel, and the two Bachs, Sebastian and Emanuel; and finally his illustrations were drawn from the works of Steibelt and another composer whom Mr. Pauer, with German-like preciseness, described as the "Irish artist," John Field. It is something of the same kind of precision and earnest truth-lovingness that induces a Hamburg shipping gazette to announce the arrival of "the Scotch ship 'Jolly Young Waterman,'" John Field, truly enough, was an Irishman, as Sterne was, and in the same way that the children of many of our friends in India are Hindoos, or that one-half of the so-called German composers are anything or everything from a Hun or Croat to a Saxon or Dutchman. Field was not an Irish artist in the sense that Carolan certainly was, or that any O'Flynn or O'Flaherty might be. In many cases the literary care and precision of Mr. Pauer's fellow-countrymen might be imitated with advantage. For instance, on looking up the name of Field in the "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens" by Fétis, in which work the quotations in English are generally speaking exceedingly correct, we find that Field's Opus 17 consisted of "Deux airs Anglais 'Go to the devil' et 'Shake yourself.'"

In the historical sketch of his subject, Mr. Pauer traced the germs of drawing-room music to the stately old dances, the Pavan, the Gavotte, and Bourrée, and so on to the Suite and the Paritta; and he quoted from the short and practical preface to Bach's "Clavier-Uebung," as well as from a more diffuse preface of Couperin's, to show the motives which induced those musicians to write in a light and pleasant style. The motives resembled those that are said to have influenced Luther in choosing melodies for his hymns. If the ears of amateurs were to be tickled, there was no reason, thought those great men, why trivial and inferior composers should "have all the best tunes." Contemporaneously with the dance-tunes used as separate pieces, or as parts of a Suite, there arose certain pièces caractéristiques, with amusingly fanciful titles, that Mr. Pauer seems to consider the beginning of programme music. We assume he means as far only as music for the harpsichord, and ultimately for the piano, is concerned. Amongst the illustrations given by Mr. Pauer—we need not say how well—was "La Poule," a composition by Rameau, in which an imitation of the cackling of a hen—an imitation proving far beyond the powers of that "civilised instrument," that enlarged dulcimer, the modern pianoforte—was accompanied by bright and expressive harmonies, strongly suggestive of the subsequent French School, and of the music of Cherubini and the earlier days of the Opéra-Comique. The concluding illustrations in the lecture were "Le Berger et son Troupeau," by Steibelt; and "Midnight," by John Field. Field's Rondo, as a graceful and tenderly sentimental composition, was all that could be desired; but it had little affinity with what is now understood by programme or descriptive music, which is not an affair of imitating the cackling of hens, or of striking an octave on the piano twelve times to imitate a church clock at midnight.

On glancing over the syllabus of Mr. Pauer's concluding lecture, which we shall not be able to notice in this number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, we see the names of Chopin, the fount and origin of the modern drawing-room style, Schulhoff, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Hiller, Litolf, Taubert, Brahms, and Liszt.

It is not easy to determine what is or is not drawing-room music; but most certainly in the last generation there were drawing-room composers par excellence, such as Herz, Thalberg, Döhler, Ravina, Prudent, &c., who are passed over by Mr. Pauer without ceremony, as not worthy of a place in his drawing-room Pantheon. We quite understand the omission as a question of taste, or as a matter of selection of music for the use of pupils at the present day; but the omission is not intelligible as a question of history. Surely Thalberg or Herz is as worthy of illustration or mention as Schulhoff! Mr. Pauer told us himself in the course of his first lecture that to fix our attention only on classical works for the chamber or the orchestra, and to affect to despise little pieces for the piano or other instruments intended for the drawing-room, was pedantry. So it is; and a pedantry of the kind extends in many directions and is one of the banes of the professional world. In the amateur world it is simply pretence—unrelieved by one glimmer from the lamp of truth.

CONFERENCE ON ORGAN CONSTRUCTION.

The adjourned meeting of the "Conference on Organ Construction" called by the Council of the College of Organists, was held at Neumeyer Hall, on the 3rd ult. The chair was occupied by E. J. Hopkins, Esq., and the meeting was very numerously attended.

Many organ-builders responded to the invitation of the Council and sent models (generally of full size) of pedals, manual keyboards, and other parts of organs, and Neumeyer Hall, was, for the time, transformed into a loan museum of special interest to organists and organ-builders.

Messrs. Bishop and Son sent an admirable model of the keyboard, pedal, and drawstop jambs of a three-manual organ. Messrs. Brindley and Foster exhibited an important model, so arranged as to admit of the trial of the pedals in different positions. The pedal sharps of this model were made of a shape to allow the crossing of the feet on the short keys. The front part of the sharp (about three inches) is of the usual shape, but the remainder of the sharp is raised about one inch to allow the change or crossing of the feet. This improvement will, it is hoped help legato playing on the pedals; it was the outcome of suggestions made at the previous meeting, and met with general approval. Messrs. Walker and Sons sent three sets of pedals—parallel, concave and parallel, and concave and radiating. Messrs. Bryceson, Jardine, Hermann Smith, Brown, and Herbert also contributed specimens of various kinds, drawings, or valuable suggestions.

Much interest was shown in the examination and comparison of the models, but little progress was made in the actual object of the conference, as the representatives of the Council of the College of Organists, finding the increased interest on the subjects submitted for consideration, as evidenced by a large attendance, allowed the resolutions that were discussed at the former meeting to be reconsidered and further discussed. It is satisfactory to add that the decisions of the smaller meeting were confirmed by the larger. The position of C under C and the preference for parallel pedals were again affirmed. The limit of desirable concavity was fixed at one inch and a half. The next meeting is arranged to take place on the 8th inst.

JACQUES NICOLAS LEMMENS.

THE death of this well-known professor, which took place at Château de Linterpoort, near Malines, Belgium, on the 30th of January, removed from the world of art a man of acknowledged ability, who might, perhaps, under more stimulating conditions, have attained yet higher rank. M. Lemmens was born at Zoerle-Parwys in the province of Antwerp, on January 3, 1823. After having received lessons from his father, who was parish organist, he became a pupil of M. Van der Broeck at Diest, and, in 1839, entered the Conservatory at Brussels. His stay there was, however, short. Called to discharge his sick father's duties, M. Lemmens quickly succeeded Van der Broeck at Diest, but in 1841 he determined to re-enter the Brussels Academy. His progress was such that, five years later, the Belgian Government provided him with funds to study under Adolphe Hesse at Breslau. After twelve months in the Silesian capital, Lemmens returned home with a document from Hesse to the effect that he could teach him nothing more; and, in 1849, the young man entered upon the post of professor of the organ at his alma mater. In this capacity he laboured zealously and well till, in 1857, on his thirty-fourth birthday, he married Miss Sherrington, and, some time after, settled in London. His career amongst us is too well-known for recapitulation. Enough that, not long before his death, he returned to his native land, which, though almost naturalised in England, he had never ceased to love. M. Lemmens's contributions to the repertory of the organ and of the church were numerous. Many of them, it is safe to say, will keep him in the remembrance of his contemporaries, and hand down his name to posterity.

MR. OSCAR BERINGER gave his fourth annual Recital at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, the 2nd ult., when many friends and members of the musical profession attended to hear the clever pianist carry out a programme requiring an executant of more than ordinary industry and skill. The kind of music Mr. Beringer presented was never intended for minds untrained in modern elaborations; but for that class of persons, still really few, who affect progress. If, therefore, fashion forbore to visit St. James's Hall on this occasion, certainly the active thinkers of the day, engaged in endeavours to solve musical problems, were present. That much remains yet to be cleared up, in some of the numbers of the programme tendered by Mr. Beringer, will scarcely be questioned, for it contained the Sonata in B flat (Op. 106), Beethoven; Sonata in A flat (Op. 39), Weber; Sonata in F minor (Op. 5), Brahms; and the Sonata in B minor, Liszt. By this selection it will be seen that Mr. Beringer is an expounder of the advanced school of musical thought. For some time past he has announced himself, perhaps in dubious phraseology, as a teacher of the "higher development" of pianoforte-playing. Leaving the cultivated and well-planned fields of art, he courageously engages in the labour of clearing away impediments found in the extreme borders of the hitherto almost untraversed regions of music. It is evident that Mr. Beringer brings to his self-imposed task trained hands and a practical mind. His touch is crisp and vocal, and facility never forsakes his agile fingers. The mechanical difficulties of the fourth movement in Beethoven's 106 were fairly surmounted, the complications of the finale to Brahms's Sonata were honestly met, and Liszt's perplexities received the advantage of careful statement. Mr. Beringer never once showed hesitation or the slightest sign of inability to perform the music placed on the desk before him. That all was not made fully clear to the listener may probably be considered by some not his fault, but the consequence of dulness in the auditor, who, by the way, may be inclined on his part to retort, that wantonness in the composer perhaps had something to do with the thick mists which the pianist, with all his honest labour, could not drive away. Mr. Beringer was listened to with attention and interest, and received the warm applause of an appreciative audience.

THE 143rd Anniversary Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians was held at St. James's Hall on the 10th ult., under the presidency of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught. The hall presented a most brilliant appearance, the front of the orchestra being decorated with plants, the guests numbering about 300, and upwards of 200 ladies occupying the galleries. The speeches during the evening were exceptionally good; for, in addition to the usual appeal from the chairman, Prince Leopold responded in an eloquent manner for the toast of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and the rest of the Royal Family; the United States Minister spoke with happy effect upon the good feeling existing between the country he was in and that which he represented; and a speech as remarkable for beauty of thought as for felicity of expression was made by Sir Frederick Leighton, in response to the toast "The Sister Arts," which was proposed by Sir J. Monckton. An interesting event of the evening was the announcement of a donation of a thousand guineas to the Society from Mr. Molineux, who was complimented by the Chairman and compelled to bow his acknowledgments to the warm applause which greeted him upon all sides. The solo artists who assisted at the Festival were Lady Benedict (pianoforte), Mr. Carrodus (violin), and Madame Leonora Braham, Madame Mary Cummings, and Mr. W. H. Burgon, vocalists; accompanists, Mr. Eaton Fanning, Mr. Fountain Meen, and Master Carrodus. The South London Choral Association, under the direction of Mr. L. C. Venables, gave an excellent selection of part-music, and the band of the Grenadier Guards, conducted by Mr. D. Godfrey, performed during dinner. The subscriptions (including the donation from Mr. Molineux) amounted to £1,600.

THAT there is new life in the counsels of the Philharmonic Society is evidenced by the prospectus of the season, which announces not only that unknown works will be included in the programmes, but that for every Concert there will be two rehearsals. Six, instead of the usual eight, Concerts will be given; and, in addition to many of the best standard compositions, the following interesting works are promised: Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony (first time in its entirety since 1839), for the performance of which the orchestra will be increased to the number of 100, the choruses will be sung by 150 members of the upper choir of the South London Choral Association, under the direction of Mr. Leonard C. Venables, and the semi chorus will consist of twelve professional vocalists; the same composer's "Waverley" Overture; Raff's "Autumn" Symphony; Handel's "Concerto Grosso," for strings; a Pianoforte Concerto by Scharwenka (for the first time in this country); a new orchestral work by F. H. Cowen (written expressly for the Society); J. O. Grimm's Orchestral Suite in Canon form; Dvorák's "Sclavische Rhapsodie," and Overtures by Goldmark and Svendsen. Engagements have been accepted by Mesdames Albani, Trebelli, and Patey, Mdles, Zaré Thalberg and Vera Timanoff, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Herbert Reeves, Herr Scharwenka, Mr. Eugene D'Albert, and Herr Joachim. It is also probable that Madame Christine Nilsson and M. Rubinstein will appear during the season. Mr. W. G. Cusins retains the office of Conductor. The first Concert, announced for February 24, occurs too late for notice in our present number.

THE organ at the Church of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Watling Street, close to St. Paul's Cathedral, which has recently been enlarged by the addition of a third row of keys, was first used for Divine Service in its completed state, on Sunday, January 30, the formal "reopening" taking place five days later, namely, on the afternoon of Friday, the 4th ult., on which day a special Evensong was sung at five p.m., commencing with Dr. Stainer's anthem "O Zion, that bringest good tidings," the other anthems chosen being the same composer's "I desired wisdom," after the third collect, and Spohr's Eighty-fourth Psalm, "How lovely are Thy dwellings fair," which followed a most earnest address from the Bishop of Bedford. The choir of the church received invaluable assistance from that of the neighbouring cathedral, and the complete musical success of the festival was due in no small degree to Dr. Stainer, who accompanied the service throughout, giving way, however, at its close to Mr. C. F. South, Organist of the church, by whom an interesting and varied selection of organ music was then performed. The most important addition to the organ is, as already stated, that of a complete choir organ of six stops (viz., dulciana, gamba, and lieblich gedackt, eight feet; flute, four feet; piccolo, two feet; and corno di bassetto, eight feet), which add very greatly to the effect of the instrument, and tell exceedingly well in the church. The builder of the original organ was Mr. Henry Willis; and to him, therefore, were entrusted the alterations and additions which have been so satisfactorily carried out.

THE series of six Concerts given, as usual, by the Società Orchestrale of Florence during the winter season, was brought to a close on Monday, the 14th ult.; and conspicuous among the numbers of the programme was Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's first Scotch Rhapsody. Although it has already been executed at home, it was strictly new to the Società Orchestrale, and great credit is due to Professor Sbolci, the able and energetic Conductor, for his efforts to insure an adequate rendering to so interesting a work. The peculiar rhythm of the Scottish airs which Mr. Mackenzie has treated in this Rhapsody, viz., "Muirland Willie," "Braw, braw, lads," and "There was a lad was born in Kyle," naturally presented some difficulty to an orchestra not familiar with such northern strains, but, on the whole, the rendering was very effective, and the freshness of style and skilful (in parts Wagnerian) treatment, which constitute the principal merits of the work, gained hearty applause for the composer, who was present. It may be added that Mr. Mackenzie's quartet for pianoforte and stringed instruments (Op. 11) will be executed at the second series of "Matinée musicales," to be given by Signors Buonamici, Chiostrì, Sbolci, and Faini. All this is satisfactory evidence that Mr. Mackenzie's ambition soars higher than being a prophet only in his own country.

THE Three Choir Festival will be held this year at Worcester, under the patronage of the Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales. There will be a slight departure from the usual arrangements, the Festival commencing on Sunday, September 4, with a full service and sermon in the Cathedral. For the first time there will be a rehearsal on the previous Saturday, as well as on the following Monday, the effect of which will no doubt be sensibly felt in the performances. Amongst the works to be given at the Cathedral are, on Tuesday, "Elijah"; on Wednesday, a new sacred composition by A. J. Caldicott, Mus. Bac., called "The Widow of Nain," Beethoven's Symphony, No. 5, and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and in the evening Handel's "Jephtha," with Sullivan's additional accompaniments; on Thursday, Cherubini's Mass in D minor, and Beethoven's "Engedi"; on Friday, the "Messiah," and a full Cathedral Service in the evening. Secular Concerts will be given in the College Hall on Tuesday and Thursday evenings. Engagements are pending with the most eminent vocalists, but no announcement of those who will appear has yet been made. As usual, the Festival will be under the conductorship of Mr. Done.

THE sale by auction, by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson, of the residue of the stock of music-plates and copyrights of Mr. Lamborn Cock took place on January 26. The following were the principal results: The set of "Modern four-part Songs," £264 12s. (Ashdown and Parry); Pinsuti's "Minster Windows," £81 (J. Wood); Miss Lindsay's "Songs for Children," £34 (J. Wood); Pinsuti's "Sweet is the Wandering Breeze," £17 10s. (J. Wood); Bach's Preludes and Fugues, edited by Bennett, £41 6s. (Ashdown and Parry); Macfarren's "Fête D'Hiver," £18 12s.; Macfarren's "Golden Slumbers," £15 (B. Williams); Gavotte in D, £14 14s. (J. Wood); Westlake's "Lyra Studentium," £88 5s. 6d. (Ashdown and Parry); Bennett's Symphony in G minor, £44 2s. (J. Wood); Overture, "Paradise and the Peri," £32 (Augener); Benedict's "Undine," £151 9s. (Cramer); Cusins's "Royal Wedding Serenata," £49 10s. (Cusins); "Gideon," by the same composer, £86 12s. 6d. (Cusins); Masters's "Rose of Salency," £31 4s. (Cramer); Smart's "Fishermidwives," £116 5s. (Ashdown and Parry); Bennett's "Remember now," £35 17s. 6d. (L. Cock); Bennett's "Now, my God, let, I beseech Thee," £26 13s. (L. Cock). The total realised over £2,000.

WE have much pleasure in recording the decisive success of the "Twopenny Concerts," organised by Mr. Ridley Prentice, and of which we made mention a short time ago. For each performance there are 750 tickets, every one of which is sold privately, the ladies and gentlemen on the sub-committee disposing of them to poor people whom they personally know. The room is invariably crowded, all the tickets being bespoken a fortnight before the day of the Concert. By a programme recently forwarded to us we perceive that such excellent works as Mendelssohn's variations in D major for pianoforte and violoncello, Beethoven's pianoforte Sonata in F sharp (Op. 78), and vocal pieces of a high character are included in the selections; and the vocalists at the Concert on the 15th ult. were Miss Hebe Barlow, Miss Spencer Jones, the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton, and Signor Monari Rocca.

DR. BRIDGE'S Cantata "Boadicea," was performed on January 25 at the first Subscription Concert of the Wanstead Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. George Kitchin. Miss Catherine Penna, Miss A. E. Clarke, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. W. G. Forington gave an excellent rendering of the solos, special mention being due to Mr. Tower for his solo, "O glorious City," and to Mr. Forington for his singing of the Druid's prayer, "Ye dark mysterious powers." The choruses were given with much spirit and precision, and the work throughout was warmly received. The second part included a new composition entitled "Woodland Waltzes," for pianoforte duet and chorus, by Mr. J. F. H. Read, which was much applauded, and several part-songs, excellently sung by the special part-song choir.

THE first of the fourth series of "Denmark Hill Concerts" was given at the South London Institute of Music, Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on the 22nd ult. The executive artists were Mdle. Marie Krebs, MM. Ries, Zerbini, Piatti, and Lazarus; and the programme comprised the following works: Beethoven's Trio in B flat (Op. 11), Largo (Boccherini), and Bergamasca (Piatti); Carnival (Schumann), Fantasiestücke (Gade), and Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise Brillant. Songs by Grieg, Schumann, and Brüll were successfully contributed by Mdle. Friedländer, and Mr. Zerbini fulfilled the duties of accompanist. The remaining three Concerts will take place at fortnightly intervals; and, amongst other artists, Professor Joachim is announced.

A CONCERT was given on Thursday evening, the 10th ult., by the members of the St. John's Choral Society, in the School-rooms, Upper Holloway. Gounod's Oratorio "Tobias," was listened to with interest and attention. The choruses were excellently rendered by a company of well-trained voices. The soloists were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Ellis Walton, Mr. D'Arcy Ferris, and Mr. Alfred Moore, all of whom were highly satisfactory. Mr. David Beardwell, A.R.A.M., conducted; Mr. Frank Manly, R.A.M., presided at the first piano, Mr. J. Turle Lee at the second, and Mr. Robert Stiles at the harmonium. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. Several part-songs were given by the choir; and the whole entertainment reflected the utmost credit upon those responsible for its promotion.

IN response to a generally expressed wish, the Grosvenor Choral Society gave a repetition of their recent performance of Mr. J. F. Barnett's Cantata "The Ancient Mariner" at their Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday the 18th ult. The solos were well sung by Madame Worrell, Miss Lizzie Turner, Mr. David Strong, and Mr. Sydney H. Beckley, and the choruses were rendered with great care and precision. The band was led by Mr. S. Dean Grimson, and Miss Florence Hartley presided at the piano. The miscellaneous selection which followed included a clarinet solo by Mr. Julian Egerton, and the Cantata "Spring's Message" by Niels W. Gade. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. G. R. Egerton.

MASTER JOHN F. BREWER (pupil of Mr. R. S. Swaby) gave a successful Organ Recital, on the 12th ult., at the Bow and Bromley Institute. The programme included Mendelssohn's Fourth Sonata, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Hesse's Air varied in A flat, and three choruses from "Israel in Egypt," concluding with "But the waters overwhelmed their enemies." All the pieces were well played, and the performer was much applauded by a very large audience. Mr. Thos. Harper contributed a trumpet solo, and Miss Catherine Penna sang three songs with much taste and expression.

THE following have passed the first examination for the degree of Bachelor in Music at Oxford: Frederick R. Greenish, New College, and Haverfordwest, South Wales; Edward Mills, New College, and St. John's College, Battersea; Rev. John H. Mee, M.A., Merton College; William G. Merrikin, New College, and Hull; Arthur H. Stevens, Worcester College. The examiners were Sir Frederick A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., M.A., Mus. D., Christ Church, Professor of Music; C. W. Corfe, Mus. D., Christ Church, Choragus; and E. G. Monk, Mus. D., Exeter College, and York.

WE have much pleasure in recording the brilliant success of Miss Agnes Zimmermann during her visit to Germany. Her performances at two of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig were received with the most enthusiastic marks of approbation; and at Berlin she played before the Crown Prince and Princess at their palace. She will return to England for the season on the 12th inst.; and at her Concert, which is fixed for May 5, at St. James's Hall, she will no doubt be cordially welcomed by the many in this country who so thoroughly appreciate her exceptional artistic powers.

HERR EMIL MAHR, the violinist, has been playing recently in Edinburgh and Glasgow with great success, and we are glad to hear that he will appear at St. George's Hall on the 10th inst., at the second of the four Trio Concerts given by him in conjunction with Herren Laistner and Bauman. At this Concert the programme will include Mr. C. Hubert Parry's Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, a graceful tribute from German artists to our countryman's genius.

ST. PAUL'S DAY, January 25, was marked at St. Paul's Cathedral by the performance, as in past years, of a large portion of Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul," with full orchestral accompaniment, under the bâton of Dr. Stainer. A new Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (in C), written for the occasion by Dr. Steggall, was sung, thus adding one more to the list of Services which have been called into existence by this Festival.

THE following letter affords another proof of the growing appreciation of British composers in Germany :

Dear Sir,—I thank you very much for kindly sending me the score and orchestral parts of Mackenzie's two "Scotch Rhapsodies" and will not fail to commend these admirable compositions to some musical directors, friends of mine, for performance. They will be included by the Conductor, Herr Erkl, in the programmes of the Philharmonic Concerts, next March, at Buda-Pesth.—Yours truly, F. LISZT.—January 26, 1881.

At Trinity College, London, an Orchestral Class, under the direction of Mr. George Mount has just been formed. The importance of this latest development of the College teaching is very great, as it affords a means of performing such works of the students of composition as may be judged worthy of a hearing, besides providing orchestral accompaniments for concertos, &c., played by pianoforte students.

Two highly interesting Lectures were delivered at Gresham College, on the evenings of the 3rd and 4th ult., the subject being the character of "Elijah" as depicted by Mendelssohn, with introductory and incidental remarks upon musical portraiture. The writer of the papers was Mr. Frederic Penna, whose rendering of the several illustrations admirably sustained the propositions laid down.

THE second Concert for the season of the Highbury Philharmonic Society will take place on the 14th inst., when Schubert's Mass in F, Mendelssohn's Operetta "Son and Stranger," and Beethoven's Choral Fantasia will be included in the programme. This Concert will take place at the Holloway Hall, Holloway Road.

WE are informed that a telegram has been received through Reuter's Agency announcing that the first prize (highest award) has been awarded to Messrs. Challen & Son, of Oxford Street, W., for their pianofortes at the Melbourne Exhibition.

BACH's "St. Matthew Passion" is to be given at the Church of St. Peter, Eaton Square, on Friday, the 25th inst., and on the two following Fridays, April 1 and 8, at 8 p.m. Voluntary assistance is needed in the alto, tenor, and bass parts.

At St. Anne's Church, Soho, Bach's "Passion" (St. John) will be sung, with orchestral accompaniment, on each Friday evening during Lent, and on Good Friday afternoon at 4 p.m.

REVIEWS.

Beethoven depicted by his Contemporaries. By Ludwig Nohl. Translated from the German by Emily Hill. [W. Reeves.]

HERR NOHL truly describes the purport of his work when he tells us in his dedication that in many of the scraps he has collected from various sources, trifling as they may appear, "we discern the man who touches our inmost soul, the artist who takes possession of our spirit; and if only very few of these descriptions display an adequate appreciation of Beethoven, the whole gives us a view of the rich landscape, with its hills and plains, its deep dark ravines and smiling meadows—the meetings of gods and the gambolling of the satyrs—and brings before us an image of the great man in all its original and distinctive features." Regarded as a supplement to the biography of the composer, the book has much interest, for the compiler has earnestly and diligently searched every place, and conversed with every person in the slightest degree connected with Beethoven at any period of his life, and gleaned some valuable information, much of which, but for such zealous research, might never have been given to the world. Respecting his early days, when he was gradually making his fame, some extracts from the published remarks of his contemporaries will be read with much pleasure. "I remember," writes Czerny, "Gelinek telling my father one day that he was invited to a party in the evening to break a lance with a new pianist. 'We will make mincemeat of him,' added Gelinek. The next day my father asked how the affair had gone off; 'Oh!' said Gelinek, quite crestfallen, 'I shall never forget yesterday. The devil is in the young man; I never heard such playing! He improvised on a theme I gave him in such a manner as I never even heard Mozart. Then he played some of his own compositions, which are wonderful and magnificent beyond everything; he brings out of the piano tones and effects we have never even dreamed of.' 'Ay,' said my father in astonishment, 'what is his name?' 'He is a short, ugly, dark, cross-looking young man,' said Gelinek, 'whom Prince Lichnowsky brought here from Germany, some years ago, to learn composition from Haydn, Albrechtsberger, and Salieri; his name is Beethoven.'" Passing hastily through the volume, which as reviewers we are reluctantly compelled to do, we are arrested by mention of a piece called "Dernière Pensée Musicale," from the publication of which, with a sensational title-page, much capital has been made in this country. It appears that a little pianoforte sketch was inserted in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, with the superscription, "Written by desire, on the afternoon of August 14, 1818, by Beethoven"; and that this was afterwards published as "Dernière Pensée Musicale." A pretty little story is related in the number of the journal which originally contained this composition respecting two ladies who, in the hurry of rising from a seat in the Baumgarten at Prague, dropped a piece of music paper, which was restored to them by the person who relates this incident. The writing upon the paper revealed the hand of Beethoven; and, on inquiry, it appeared that the master had composed the piece above mentioned at the request of a lady unknown to him, and that the owner of this treasure and her friend were earnestly deciphering it when they were interrupted. A friendly dispute as to the meaning of the composition led to its being performed before five musicians, each of whom wrote down his own opinion of it. These opinions are, of course, now valueless; but we relate the circumstance because, as there can be little doubt that a piece well-known at young ladies' schools as "Beethoven's Adieu to the Pianoforte" is this identical composition, it is good that the admirers of it should be made aware, not only of its real origin, but that it was written in the year 1818, and Beethoven did not die until 1827. An interesting portion of the book is the extract from the recollections of Beethoven, by the Austrian poet Grillparzer, chiefly on account of the information he gives us respecting the text of the opera which he wrote for him. After a decisive request from the master to prepare a libretto for the purpose, he says, "I chose the fable of 'Melusine,' rejecting the reflective element as much as possible, and endeavouring by a preponderance of the chorus, a powerful finale, and an almost melodramatic treatment of the third act, to conform to the peculiarities of Beethoven's latest style. I did not first consult the composer about the subject, as I wished to have perfect freedom for my own ideas; besides, it would, I thought, be easy to make any alterations afterwards, and he was not obliged to use the libretto at all unless he pleased. Indeed, to save him from the least feeling of restraint, I sent him the book through the same channel by which I received the request. I desired him to be in no way influenced or embarrassed by personal considerations." Curiously enough, Beethoven made scarcely any objection to the text, merely remarking that he was going into the country in a day or two, and should then commence the composition of the work; "Only I don't know," he said, "what to do with the Huntsmen's Chorus at the beginning. Weber has used four horns, you see, therefore I must have eight; what will that lead to?" Grillparzer, naturally enough, remarks that he did not in the least see the force of this reasoning; but when he told him that the chorus could be omitted without any detriment to the whole, he appeared perfectly satisfied. Being about this period at work upon his Ninth Symphony, it is scarcely to be imagined that he could think much of the Opera, and the poet, therefore, upon meeting him avoided conversing upon the subject. In company with Schindler, however, he dined with him, even when he was thus pressed for time, and on this occasion a characteristic anecdote is related of him. "When about to return," Grillparzer says, "to the city alone—for Schindler remained at Hetzendorf—Beethoven insisted on accompanying me. He rode with me in the open carriage as far as the gates of the city, where he got out, and, after warmly shaking hands with me, set off to walk the half (German) mile back alone. As soon as he had left the carriage, I saw a piece of paper lying on the place where he had been sitting, and, thinking he had forgotten it, I motioned to him to return. But he only shook his head, burst out laughing as if he had played a capital trick, and walked rapidly away in the opposite direction. I opened the paper and found it contained the exact fare I had agreed upon with my driver." The latter portion of these extracts from Grillparzer's narrative seems to prove, undoubtedly, that the composer had not forgotten his promise to set the libretto with which the poet had furnished him: "I only saw," he says, "Beethoven once again, but I do not remember where. He then said to me, 'Your Opera is ready.' Whether he meant that it was complete in his head, or whether the elements of it were contained piecemeal in some of the numberless notebooks in which he jotted down, in a manner understandable only to himself, thoughts and figures for future use, I cannot say. Certain it is that after his death not a note could be found indisputably referring to this work. I adhered to my determination of not reminding him of the matter by the slightest hint; and, as conversation by writing was troublesome, I never approached Beethoven again till, in black attire, with a torch in my hand, I followed his coffin." The accounts of the latter days of the composer are already tolerably well-known to the public. The papers left by the surgeon, Dr. Wawruch, furnished the materials for an article published in the Wiener Zeitschrift in 1842, in which minute particulars are given of Beethoven's last illness; but as the Doctor, who was a stranger to his patient, was bound to prove to the satisfaction of the public that he thoroughly understood the case, and that he could not have been better attended, we should scarcely, perhaps, rely too much upon the soundness of his facts, especially as it is well known that the fluids he freely administered caused so much weakness that he was compelled hastily to alter his treatment. In closing Herr Nohl's volume we cannot but feel that we are largely indebted to him for the energy he has displayed in collecting so many authentic records of the composer's career; for to every lover of music the minutest fact connected with one who has so ennobled the art is a matter of the deepest interest.

A Grammar of Music; with numerous illustrations. By Carl Th. Kühne. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

WHEN we say that the earnestness of this book is one of its principal recommendations, we do not by any means intend to detract from the merit of the workmanship, for the author has well developed his theory, an exposition of which is given in the preface. Those, however, who have followed our reviews upon musical works for the young, will know that we have always expressed our disbelief in the principle of teaching children the elements of the art either by games or by pictorial representations of any of the symbols used in musical notation. Nevertheless, the author of this book thinks differently; and with the idea of impressing the mind through the eye, gives "A Bar illustrated by the Basket with Fruit," "The Circle of Fifths in shape of a Clock-Dial," "Expression represented by light thrown upon a landscape," &c., the whole of which, we venture to say, must be replaced by the undisguised musical signs before they can be of any practical service. All this, however, is a matter of opinion; and if our author has proved that by representing bars with an apple, two apricots, four plums, eight strawberries, sixteen nuts, and thirty-two currants, instead of the well-known notes to which these correspond, he is perfectly right so to teach them. But we cannot agree with him that, in a book published in England, a child should be taught that notes are called "Wholes," "Halves," &c.; for, rational as the system may be, they are not so termed in this country, and the young musical student will be speaking in a language, therefore, which cannot be understood. It is true that he is told they are "also called" Semibreves, Minims, &c., but this, we think, will still more confuse him; and we see no reason, indeed, why the author should not "go much further," as he says in his preface he should like to do, and retain only the treble clef, indicating by a sign the octave to be used; for this method—like the bars first represented by fruit—might afterwards be translated into the received notation further on in the book. Passing on to the musical part of the work, we have some very good hints on the rudiments of Harmony. But, here again, we find that the author differs from many of the received definitions of certain terms, and we cannot but think, therefore, that some perplexity may arise in consequence. For example, we are told that the Dominant seventh, "being a dissonant chord, will not give a satisfactory impression without being properly prepared." This we by no means agree with; but granting it, for the sake of argument, surely "preparation of a discord" means that the discordant note shall appear in the preceding chord, and in the same part. Herr Kühne, however, tells us that it means preceding the discord by "some chord with connecting link." Acting upon this principle, he gives us the first inversion of the augmented triad on the third of the minor scale, G B \sharp , E \flat , G, which he says prepares the dominant seventh, G, B \sharp , D, F; students, after this example, must certainly have a confused idea of the preparation of what are termed "secondary sevenths." Apart from these objections, however, there is much to praise in the book, more especially, as we have already said, on account of the earnestness with which the author has worked; for something is said of Counterpoint, Form in Composition, Acoustics, and many other branches of the art. All the illustrations are exceedingly good; and great care has been exercised in the printing of the work.

A Second Set of Ten Trios for Female Voices. Composed by Carl Reinecke. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

To all who can fully appreciate the ingenuity of the canonical form of writing adopted in these compositions, as well as to those who merely regard them as charmingly melodious Trios, the collection now before us—especially composed for female voices—will most forcibly appeal. "From Venice," a two-part canon in the fifth below, with a free part; "When two are lovers," a three-part canon in the unison; "A Maiden's Song," a two-part canon in contrary motion, with a free part; Song from "Mirza Schaffy," a two-part canon in the second, with a free part; and "Snow in Spring," a three-part canon by augmentation and diminution, are our especial favourites, the last-named being a composition which may be well recommended to students as an excellent example of contrapuntal writing. Such fine contributions to an art, of which Herr Reinecke is so distinguished an ornament, deserve, and we trust will command, an extensive sale.

Harold Glynde. A Cantata. Written by Edward Fosskett; with original music by John Stainer, M.A., Mus. Doc., C. S. Jekyll, George C. Martin, Mus. Bac., and other well-known composers. [F. Pitman.]

THE idea of enlisting the services of a number of artists in the composition of a Cantata is somewhat novel; but, save for some inevitable contrasts of style, the experiment seems to have been tolerably successful. The libretto does not afford much opportunity for the display of any special dramatic power, and the music throughout is, therefore, somewhat simple in character; but Choral Societies will not deem this an objection, and the melodiousness of the work will be certain to ensure it a welcome with a mixed audience. The poem is well laid out for musical treatment.

Hymn to St. Cecilia. For Soprano Solo and Chorus. Composed by L. Spohr. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

NOTHING can more effectually tend to popularise the shorter sacred pieces of Spohr than their publication in Novello's well-known Octavo Edition; and that his beautiful "Hymn to St. Cecilia," now that it is issued in this form, will speedily make its way into some musical circles previously unacquainted with its merits there can be little doubt. The increasing appreciation of this composer's Oratorios is a proof that the constant presentation of specimens of more modern musical art has by no means weakened our admiration for the creations of those who shed such a lustre upon the age in which they lived: and we are glad to find, therefore, that the demand for these time-honoured musical classics will never be allowed to exceed the supply.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE one hundredth anniversary of the production of Mozart's first classical opera, "Idomeneo," has just been celebrated by appropriate performances in various parts of Germany. "Idomeneo, Re di Creta, ossia Ilia e Idamante. Drame per musica in tre atti" was first performed at Munich on January 29, 1781, resulting in a most unequivocal success for the young composer, then twenty-five years of age. At the Berlin Opera the commemorative performance of the work, which had not been heard there for twenty-two years, took place on the 4th ult., and is said to have produced an excellent impression; special praise being bestowed upon the delivery of the choruses, which form an important feature in the opera.

Count Hochberg's opera "Der Wärfwolf" was brought out, on the 6th ult., at the Dresden Hoftheater, with every mark of approval on the part of the audience. We have already drawn attention to the work some years ago, on the occasion of its partial production before a select private circle at Berlin.

The Dresden Conservatorium has just celebrated, by an appropriate festive Concert, the twenty-fifth anniversary of its existence. Reissiger, Krebs, and Rietz, have, during this period, taken active parts in the artistic management of the institution, the present Director of which is Dr. Wüllner.

According to the Vienna Presse, Herr Paul Joukowsky, a gifted artist who has followed Richard Wagner from Italy to his Bavarian abode, has already designed numerous sketches for the different scenes of the first and second acts of "Parsifal." The instrumentation of the work, the journal adds, is steadily progressing under the hands of the master; Herr Josef Rubinstein being at the same time busily engaged upon the pianoforte arrangement of the score, following the poet-composer step by step in his progress.

A new opera from the pen of the able composer, Herr Robert Emmerich, entitled "Van Dyck," will shortly be produced at the Stuttgart Hoftheater.

A recent number of the Deutsche Musiker Zeitung contains an article entitled "Wagner in London," from the pen of Dr. Langhans, embodying a translation of our leader "The King and Parsifal" contained in our last issue, and concluding with the remark: "Should the warm commendations of THE MUSICAL TIMES have the effect of ensuring for our national master, on the other side of the Channel, that kindly interest which is due to him, artistic Germany would have every reason to be satisfied, and could well afford to take the otherwise little flattering remarks of the writer concerning ourselves into the bargain."

M. Lamoureux, the former director of the orchestra at the Paris Opéra, has formed a Society for the performance of orchestral music every Sunday afternoon, under the style of Société des Nouveaux Concerts. The concerts are to be held at the Paris Théâtre du Château d'Eau.

At the Paris Opéra the greatest activity is being displayed in the rehearsals of M. Gounod's new opera "Le Tribut de Zamora," and it is confidently expected that the work will be brought out on the 15th or 20th of this month. M. Gounod is indefatigable in revising and remodelling some of the scenes, being determined that his long expected operatic novelty shall be perfect in every detail.

Notwithstanding the habitual antagonism exhibited by Parisian audiences against Herr Wagner's music, M. Colonne, the Director of the Châtelet Concerts, has ventured to introduce, in one of his recent programmes, the poet-composer's characteristic "Ride of the Valkyries" (La chevauchée des Walkyries), from "Der Ring des Nibelungen." The effect proved irresistible, storms of applause followed the performance, and the piece had to be repeated at the following concert.

Subscriptions are being raised for the purpose of erecting a monument to Ole Bull at Bergen, in Norway.

An opera, "Le Partisan," from the pen of the Count d'Osmond, one of the contributors to the Revue des deux Mondes, is shortly to be brought out at the Théâtre Italien at Nice.

Verdi is said to be engaged upon the composition of an opera, "Othello," to be first produced at Vienna, with Madame Materna as the representative of Desdemona.

The number of Italian operas brought out during the past year is, according to the Leipzig Signale, thirty-nine, including "Don Giovanni d'Austria," by Marchetti; "Cola di Rienzi," by Ricci; "Il Sogno d'Amore," by Bellini; "Il Figliuolo Prodigo," by Ponchielli; and "Maria di Gand," by Tito Mattei.

Arrigo Boito has recently met with a most enthusiastic reception by the people of Padua, his native town. After the first performance there of his opera "Mefistofele," a banquet was given in honour of the composer, who was, moreover, presented with a silver laurel wreath, and an artistically adorned address, on the first page of which three palm leaves are represented, in happy allusion to the historical "Goethe Palm," still existing in the botanical gardens of Padua. The author of "Faust," when visiting the town in the year 1787, greatly admired the plant in question, and, being likewise an adept in natural science, probably added some botanical observations on the occasion. The palm became henceforth known as the "Goethe Palm," while an admirer of the poet, Signor Visiani, caused a tablet to be affixed to the tree, bearing the following inscription: "Johann Wolfgang Goethe, poet and naturalist, has, in 1787, derived from this palm the suggestion and the proofs for his theory of the 'Metamorphosis of Plants.'"

M. Gevaert, the director of the Bruxelles Conservatoire, is just now engaged upon the composition of a cantata entitled, "Het volk van Gent," which is to be produced this year.

A correspondent writes to us from Nice: "This town has enjoyed an unusually brilliant opera season, and M. Bolognini may be deservedly congratulated on the success which has crowned his efforts in the management of the Théâtre Italien. The short engagement of Madame Patti was more than justified by the reception accorded to the diva, while the début of Mlle. Valda in Marchetti's opera 'Ruy Blas,' was a veritable surprise for those who had not previously heard Lamperti's distinguished pupil. At the Théâtre Français large audiences have been attracted by Miss Minnie Hauk in the operas of 'Faust,' and 'Carmen.'"

We have received the first number of a new journal devoted to art and literature, published at Barcelona, and bearing the title of El Arte.

Anton Rubinstein's present concert-tour in Spain is said to be attended by a series of ovations unexampled even in the experience of this much-admired pianist. The enthusiasm created by his playing is, in fact, described as "fabulous."

Herr Ferdinand Hiller is on his way to Barcelona, where he will conduct a series of Classical Concerts to be given by the Philharmonic Society of that town.

The series of concerts given at Florence by the Società Orchestrale Fiorentina came to a close on the 14th ult. These performances, as we have already previously indicated, have been instituted by an English resident, Miss Cox, who, as a correspondent informs us, "has done much during the last few winters in fostering the taste for classical and other high-class music in La Bella Firenze." We include the programmes of the last two concerts at the foot of these notes.

Recent performances at the Theatre Regio of Turin included Bottesini's "Regina di Nepal" (which ran but for a few nights), Verdi's "Aida," Wagner's "Lohengrin," Boito's "Mefistofele," and Thomas's "Amleto." In the last-mentioned opera Signora Donadio produced much effect, both by her poetic conception of the rôle of Ofelia and her excellent vocalisation. Our correspondent also bestows much praise upon the singing of Signora Turolla (in the "Regina di Nepal"), and of Signora Warda-Miller (in "Carmen"). Grammann's "Melusine" is in course of preparation. During Passion-week a historical concert of sacred music is to be given by the Stefano Tempia Choral Society, and in June next an International Musical Congress will be held, when two monster fêtes are to be included, consisting of instrumental and vocal performances respectively.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert Populaire (January 30): Symphony, "Eroica" (Beethoven); "Pîngst-Cantate" (Bach); Barcarole (Saint-Saëns); Concerto Russe, for violin (Lalo); Gavotte (Lulli); Overture, "La Terreur" (Litolff). Concert Populaire (February 6): Military Symphony (Haydn); Septet (Saint-Saëns); Scene from "Le Tasse" (B. Godard); Concertstück for Clarinet (Mendelssohn); Fragments from "Flying Dutchman" (Wagner); "Invitation à la Valse" (Weber-Berlioz). Châtelet Concert (February 6): Symphonie Fantastique (Berlioz); Réverie (Schumann); Overture, "Hamlet" (Mathias); Two Orchestral Pieces (Saint-Saëns); "Ride of the Valkyries" (Wagner); Invitation à la Valse (Weber-Berlioz). Conservatoire (February 13): Symphony, B flat (Beethoven); Chorus from "St. Paul" (Mendelssohn); Fragment from "Prometheus" (Beethoven); Fragment from "Sigurd" (Reyer); Overture, "Oberon" (Weber). Concert Populaire (February 13): Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); Violin Solos (Wieniawski and Lotto); Ballet Airs from "Feramors" (Rubinstein); Evensong (Schumann); Concertstück (Weber); Marche Tzigane (Reyer). First Peabody Concert (January 29): Symphonie Dramatique (Rubinstein); Norwegian Folk-Life for pianoforte (Grieg); Norwegian Rhapsody (Svendsen).

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EARL OF MAR v. THE "EDINBURGH QUARTERLY REVIEW" ON MENDELSSOHN, IN "GROVE'S DICTIONARY."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The article in the Edinburgh Review for this quarter, on Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," the most comprehensive and masterly work of its kind, is so ably written and so generally interesting that I feel I owe an apology to the reviewer for venturing to take exception to his remarks on Mendelssohn, to whom Mr.

Grove (in one of his own editorial contributions to the "Dictionary") devotes sixty eulogistic pages,—thereby ruffling the reviewer's equanimity.

My excuse must be enthusiastic love of the divine art, and especially of the music of Mendelssohn, existing from my early childhood, in no way weakened by occasionally mixing in "the musical society of cathedral towns," at which the reviewer indulges in a quiet sneer (are London, Edinburgh, Oxford, Cologne, &c., included in the category?), nor by any means is my devotion lessened by the more extended experience and cultivation I have had the good fortune to acquire through intercourse with eminent musicians, and by hearing and joining in much music of the highest class in various capitals during the last twenty-five years at least.

I would that the Editor had a far abler champion than I can pretend to be, in defence of his sixty charming pages on Mendelssohn, which yon reviewer is pleased to term a "drag upon the book," for which he takes Mr. Grove to task. However, the Editor assuredly sins in good company. Among the ardent admirers of the immortal composer of "Elijah," the names at once occur to me of such writers as Schumann, Macfarren, Benedict, J. W. Davison, and Hiller; also of W. S. Rockstro, whom, by the way, the reviewer eulogises as "a pillar of strength, and the writer of some of the most important of the larger articles in Groves' 'Dictionary.'"

From the reviewer's depreciation of Mendelssohn's genius, and his influence on art, and the statement that "reaction has set in against him, traceable to the influence of Wagnerism," I must unwillingly conclude, either that the reviewer's veneration for other composers has temporarily blinded him to the exalted position Mendelssohn continues to hold among the musical artists, critics, and audiences of Europe, or that he has been suddenly afflicted with a strange forgetfulness of the majority of Mendelssohn's greatest works; though, in justice, I must add that the reviewer mentions (the only work he specifies) his "memorable set of Organ Sonatas," as "the most remarkable event in organ composition since the time of Bach," and that the "first Sonata has almost, by itself, made a new era in handling the organ."

It is true that Mendelssohn may be almost unknown in small continental towns where "music" and "opera" are synonymous terms; for he wrote little strictly operatic music, which is explained by his having been almost impossible to please in the matter of libretti—good libretti in his time being the exception; yet it would be idle to deny that he possessed dramatic feeling and power of a very high order, amply exhibited, for instance, in his "Walpurgisnacht," in the magnificent fragments from his tragic opera "Lorelei" (which, dying at an early age, alas! he left unfinished), and in many of the scenes in "Elijah." Among his lesser works, his four-part songs and the "Lieder ohne Worte" stand unrivalled still.

Of course, in the highest branch of art, the sonata, quartet, and symphony, Mendelssohn, alike with Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Spohr, and Schumann, must bow to the sublimity of Beethoven; and Mendelssohn's masterly fugues and fantasias for the pianoforte, his famous violoncello sonatas, the great B minor Quartet (written when a mere child), and his "Italian" and "Scotch" Symphonies—models of the picturesque and poetic—are overshadowed by the "Chamber Music" and the "immortal nine" symphonies of Beethoven, the Colossus among giants. But a glance at the programmes of the chief "classical" concerts, during the last quarter of a century, here and abroad, would alone show the high estimation in which Mendelssohn's music has retained its hold on the most critical audiences, exhibiting tenderness, refinement, depth of pathos, and power of fascination surpassed by none, as exemplified in such of his works as the C minor and D minor Trios, his two stringed Quintets, the great Octet (a veritable masterpiece of melody and scholarship, though produced when quite a youth); and again, by his "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Ruy Blas," and other concert overtures; and his violin Concerto, which, still played far oftener than any other, and beloved by all artists and audiences, is generally admitted to be the finest work for the violin in existence, and would alone immortalise its composer.

* Contributions intended for this column should indicate clearly the place and date of performance, as otherwise they cannot be inserted.

To the statements that "Mendelssohn's choral writing cannot compare with Cherubini's," and that "he is not strong in polyphonic composition," I fancy few adherents would be found, if acquainted with his eight-part Psalms and the scores of "St. Paul," the "Lobgesang," "Christus," and "Elijah," which are too deeply revered by the musical world to be effaced by the spasmodic, sensational, and meretricious effusions of "Wagnerism."

By the term "Wagnerism," I do not point to Wagner, —that mad genius, whose arrogance is unexampled, and who is pleased to consider he can improve on Beethoven and "gild refined gold"; for, in spite of his extravagancies and his distressing mania in occasionally polluting the purity of the beautiful melody with which he is often inspired, by discord dire, if not hideous howls, he is nevertheless to be regarded by all as a giant in colouring and dramatic force.

I apply the term "Wagnerism" to the system, or rather want of system, of those who would enter the lists with him, but who out-Wagner Wagner, who despise the very alphabet and grammar (which Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn at least were not too proud to respect and to follow as essential to the existence of the language of music), and who shamelessly outrage the divine art by formless freaks and convulsive vagaries, unredeemed even by the merit of "method in their madness."

To these shapeless concoctions, the term "Music of the Future" is not applicable, for, happily, it can never be the Music of the Present, and must be always "of the Future"; but from such a future may a merciful Providence deliver us! "Wagnerism" (repeating your own quotation from the words of W. S. Rockstro), "neither the gods nor men can tolerate," and, "after all, 'Non più andrai,' and 'Madamina' may win the day"; to which, in conclusion, I venture with perfect confidence to add my prediction that the taste for "Wagnerism" will be very transient, and that with the undying strains of the "divine Mozart" the works of Mendelssohn will retain their charm as models of genuine music, distinguished by unalloyed melody, purity of form, perfection of symmetry, and unrivalled refinement, and thus remain, in all time, a thing of beauty and a joy for ever.—Believe me, Sir, Your faithful servant,

EMPLOYMENT OF THE ORGAN IN THE ORCHESTRA.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Mr. Prout, in his admirable paper published in your issue of March, 1879, entitled "The Employment of the Organ in the Orchestra," especially as illustrated by Mendelssohn, says: "Four of Mendelssohn's scores contain a fully written-out organ part. These are 'St. Paul,' 'Elijah,' the 'Lobgesang,' and the 'Ninety-eighth Psalm.' Besides this, the employment of the organ is indicated in the Forty-second and Ninety-fifth Psalms, but here we find simply col organo and senza organo."

In addition may be cited Mendelssohn's Op. 23, No. 2, an "Ave Maria" for eight voices. In the first edition a figured continuo is written to indicate the accompaniment. In the second edition the composer inserted the part for the organ which was omitted in the first edition, together with a continuo on a separate staff, and parts for two clarinets, two bassoons, cello, and bass, which were also printed in the first edition.—Respectfully,

FRANKLIN FISKE HEARD.

20, Herald Building, Boston, Mass., U.S.

[Mr. Heard's letter having been forwarded to me for reply, I would only say that the case to which he alludes is not quite parallel with those referred to in my article. I was treating of the use of the organ in conjunction with the orchestra. In Mendelssohn's "Ave Maria," Op. 23, No. 2, the score of which lies before me, it is distinctly stated that the clarinets, bassoons, violoncellos, and bass were added as a substitute for the organ, when the latter instrument is not available. The proper form of the work is with organ only; and the continuo is, of course, merely the "short-hand" method of writing the organ part, which was mostly adopted by Handel and Bach.—EBENEZER PROUT.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

CONSTANT READER.—Counterpoint should be written both above and below the canto fermo; but we recommend our correspondent to consult a good work on the subject.

A. J. CORRIE.—In any work on Temperament, in the Appendix to Mr. Ellis's Translation of "Helmholtz," and in Mr. R. M. Bosanquet's article on "Temperament" in Stainer and Barrett's "Dictionary," our correspondent will find the general reason why a sound we call D flat may be lower in pitch than a C sharp. A C sharp seven-fifths up is higher than a D flat five-fifths down. Hewitt, in his "True Science of Music," gives a system of twenty-one and many others in a comparative table or diagram. Everything depends upon the system of Temperament.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

AYLESBURY.—A fine performance of Spohr's Last Judgment was given by the members of the Vale of Aylesbury Sacred Harmonic Society in the Corn Exchange on the 10th ult. The band included Messrs. Buziau, Van Heddeghem, Webb, Woolhouse, and Egerton. Miss Stedman presided at the pianoforte. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Wootton, Mrs. Webb, Mr. Hales, Mr. Ingram, and Mr. E. Roberts; Conductor, Mr. R. B. Bateman.

BIRMINGHAM.—The third of Messrs. Harrison's Subscription Concerts was given in the Town Hall on Monday, January 24. The artists were, vocalists: Miss Minnie Hawk, Miss Orridge, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley; pianoforte, Mdle. Marie Krebs; violoncello, Mons. Van Biene; organ, Mr. Stimpson; and Mr. W. Ganz, Conductor. The programme, which was of a miscellaneous character, was thoroughly appreciated.—The fourth of Mr. Stratton's Popular Chamber Concerts took place in the Masonic Hall on Tuesday, the 1st ult. The programme comprised, Cherubini's String Quartet in E flat, Reinecke's Suite for violin and pianoforte, Op. 153, and Charles E. Stephens's Piano Quartet in B minor, Op. 2. All these were performed for the first time in Birmingham, the composer of the last-named work being present. The strings were Mr. T. M. Abbott, Mr. W. Griffin, violins; Mr. F. Ward, viola; and Mr. Owen, violoncello. Dr. C. S. Heap was the pianist, and, besides taking part in the works mentioned, gave a masterly rendering of Schubert's Fantasia in C, Op. 15. Mr. Owen performed with taste Mendelssohn's "Lied ohne Worte" for violoncello, accompanied by the director. The attendance showed a decided increase upon that of the previous Concerts.—The Festival Choral Society gave the second of its current series of Concerts at the Town Hall on Thursday, the 3rd ult. Mendelssohn's Lobgesang and Gade's Crusaders constituted the programme. The vocal principals were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Emilie Harris, Mr. Barton M'Guckin (who replaced Mr. Vernon Rigby, prevented by sudden indisposition from appearing), and Mr. Frederick King. The performances were very good, the orchestral parts of both works being given in an admirable manner. Mr. Stimpson was, as usual, invaluable at the organ, and Mr. Stockley conducted with his accustomed tact and skill.

BOURNEMOUTH.—A performance of Mr. T. Arthur Burton's new Oratorio Jonah was given at the Town Hall on January 28, by the Bournemouth Musical Society. The composer conducted the Oratorio, and was twice called before the audience. The choruses were tolerably steady, though somewhat lacking in attack. The bass solos were taken by the Rev. — Brackenbury, and the band was led by Mr. Levason.

BRISTOL.—On Monday, the 7th ult., the band of the Grenadier Guards gave, for the third time this season, two Concerts in the Colston Hall. The programmes included the Overture to Masaniello (Auber), and selections from The Pirates of Penzance and Olivette. The bands of the Bristol Volunteer Artillery Corps, the Rifle Volunteer Corps, and the rifle and drum bands of the Artillery Volunteer and Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers also assisted. Mr. H. Roe played a concertina solo, and Mr. F. Roe a piccolo solo. Some glees were given by Messrs. B. Gay, W. J. Kidner, S. H. Morgan, and H. J. Dyer.—On Tuesday, the 8th ult., Mr. Augustus Simmons gave his annual Concert at the Colston Hall, the first part comprising Haydn's Imperial Mass, and the second part consisting of a miscellaneous selection. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Signor Montecco. The band and chorus consisted of 200 performers. Mr. Frederic Watts led the band, Mr. W. R. Nicholas accompanied, and Mr. Augustus Simmons conducted.—On Monday, the 14th ult., Mr. George Risleley gave the eighth of his excellent Monday Popular Concerts at the Colston Hall. Wagner's Overture to The Flying Dutchman, Hérold's Overture to Zampa, and Massenet's Scènes Pittoresques (Suite d'Orchestra, No. 4), were excellently rendered. Mr. George Risleley also played, in conjunction with the band, Prout's grand Concerto in E minor for organ and orchestra, under the direction of the composer, and Miss Chute took the pianoforte in Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro Giojoso (Op. 43) for pianoforte and orchestra. In addition to this selection, a new MS. Overture to Shakespeare's Twelfth Night composed by Mr. Prout, was performed for the first time, under the direction of the composer. The overture is written in the customary classical form, except that an episode in D minor, in slow time, is substituted for the "free fantasia" or "working out." The vocalists were Miss Arthur and Mr. Henry Pope. Mr. A. W. Waite led the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted.—On Saturday, the 19th ult., two Concerts were given in the Colston Hall, by the band of the Coldstream Guards, assisted by the bands of the Bristol Artillery Volunteers, the Bristol Rifle Volunteers, and the pipers of the Scots Guards. The principal pieces in the programme were the Overtures to Der Freischütz (Weber) and William Tell (Rossini), Wagner's March Tannhäuser, Gounod's Processional March La Reine de Saba, and Michaelis's March "Turkish Patrol." Miss Hilda Wilson, R.A.M., was the vocalist, and Mr. C. Thomas conducted.

CLIFTON.—On Monday, the 7th ult., Mrs. Viner Pomeroy gave her third Classical Chamber Concert at the Victoria Rooms, when the performers were Mr. Henry Holmes, first violin; Mr. Alfred Burnett, second violin and viola; Mr. J. Pomeroy, violoncello; and Mrs. Viner Pomeroy, pianoforte. The programme included Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor (Op. 66) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat, Op. 47. Mr. J. Pomeroy gave, as a violoncello solo, an arrangement by Kummer of the Romance by Spohr "Rose, softly blooming." The attendance was very good.—On Tuesday, the 15th ult., a most enjoyable Pianoforte Recital was given in the Victoria Rooms by Herr Xaver Scharwenka. A large audience was present and thoroughly enjoyed the performance of Herr Scharwenka, who played selections from the works of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Pergolesi, and Chopin, in addition to four pieces of his own composition.—On Thursday, the 17th ult., the annual Concert of the choir of St. Mary's, Tyndall's Park, was given in the Victoria Rooms. A sacred Cantata Nicodemus, by Dr. F. E. Gladstone, was included in the programme, which was a good one, and very well rendered. Mr. Frank Smith, the Organist of the church, conducted.

CORK.—The second Concert of the Cork Orchestral Union for the present season was given in the Assembly Rooms on Tuesday evening, the 8th ult. The orchestra is now the largest and most important in Ireland, and its excellence may perhaps be attributed to the fact of its members for the past five years constantly playing together under the same Conductor. The programme included, besides other works, Schubert's Overture to Rosamunde, and the Romance from the same work, excellently sung by Fraulein von Kapffs. An Overture, written for Longfellow's "Spanish Student" by Arthur O'Leary, was received with great enthusiasm. Mr. Arthur Hill achieved a perfect success in the pianoforte part of Beethoven's B flat Concerto (No. 2), for pianoforte and orchestra. The Ballet Music from Gounod's La Reine de Saba caused a perfect furor; the third movement, with its expressive violin solo, charmingly played by Mr. R. D. Howard, being warmly encored. Signor Bonicoli's grand Concerto Fantasia for orchestra, and Mendelssohn's Wedding March completed the instrumental items. The vocal music was most excellently given by Miss Phedra Mortel, Fraulein von Kapffs, and Mr. Harry Roche. Mr. C. A. Pridmore was the accompanist; Mr. R. D. Howard, leader; and Mr. W. Ringrose Atkins, the indefatigable Conductor of the Society, occupied his usual post.—On Monday, the 14th ult., the Cork Musical Society gave a benefit Concert to Miss Lucy Ashton Hackett, under the conductorship of Dr. Marks. The programme consisted of solos, concerted pieces, and choruses of a miscellaneous character. Miss Hackett, who is a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, sang in a very finished manner; and at the conclusion of the Concert Sir John Arnott forwarded the secretary a cheque for one hundred guineas to be added to the proceeds.

CORNWOOD.—Under the able tuition of Mr. Elford, principal cornet of the Royal Marine Band, the members of the brass band have so far progressed as to be able to give their first Concert on the 14th ult. The leading feature of the programme was the performance by the band of several pieces, under the guidance of their Conductor, Mr. Elford, assisted by Mr. Ough, of Plymouth. Messrs. Elford and Ough also contributed greatly to the success of the evening by their cornet solos and duets. Miss Bundock and Messrs. Vivian and Glover sang several songs, and Master W. Glover played a violin solo, which was encored. Mrs. Parker, of Delamore, presided at the pianoforte.

DOVER.—The fifth Concert of the Dover Catch Club was given on Thursday, the 3rd ult., before a large audience. The artists, Miss Blanche Elliott, Mr. Henry Parkin, and Mr. Prenton, rendered with much effect an excellent and well arranged programme. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. C. Jarrett (who accompanied the songs, &c.) played several pieces during the evening.

DUNDEE.—The members of the select Choir gave a Concert on the 4th ult., in the Kinnaird Hall before a large audience. The choir is gaining in tone and precision, and their rendering of Smart's "Stars of the Summer Night," Edwards's "In going to my lonely bed," Hatton's "When evening's twilight," and Mr. J. M. Smeton's part-song "Under the stars" was much appreciated. Mr. J. B. Macdonald conducted.

EXMOUTH.—On the evening of the 12th ult., after a Concert in the Hall of the Commercial Coffee Palace, the Chairman informed the audience that he had been asked to make a presentation to Miss Stewart, who was about to leave Exmouth, in recognition of the kind manner in which she had supported the Exmouth Winter Concerts. Mr. Stewart handed his sister on to the platform, and General Bartlett, the chairman, addressing her, said: Miss Stewart, I have been requested by a number of the townspeople of Exmouth to offer for your acceptance this travelling clock, which bears the following inscription: "To Miss Stewart, on leaving Exmouth, in grateful memory of the active interest she has so kindly taken in the success of the Winter Concerts. Exmouth, 12th February, 1881." The subscribers trust that it may prove a good and faithful servant, and that it will sometimes remind you of your three years' residence among them. They also desire me to offer to you and your family their sincere and hearty congratulations on the well merited honours it has pleased Her Majesty to bestow on your father, for his great services in Afghanistan, ending in his appointment to the splendid position of Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's Forces in India; and, in conclusion, they beg me to wish you a prosperous passage to India, a pleasant sojourn there, and a happy return to Old England. On behalf of his sister Mr. Stewart returned thanks in a few earnest and appropriate words.

FOLKESTONE.—The new organ, so kindly presented to Christ Church by the liberality of a lady in the congregation, was opened on Wednesday, the 16th ult. The proceedings consisted of an afternoon Service, and a grand Organ Recital in the evening. An able and eloquent sermon was preached by the Rev. Field Flowers Goe, M.A., Rector of St. George's, Bloomsbury. The musical portions of the Service were exceedingly well rendered by the choir of ladies, gentlemen, and boys. The Canticles (Cantate and Deus) were sung to Hopkins in E flat, and the Anthem was Goss's "Stand up and bless the Lord your God." The organ is a beautiful instrument, built by Mr. Hunter, of Kennington Park Road. At the Recital, given by Mr. John Hopkins, assisted by the Organist, Mr. T. Pulleyn, an excellent programme was performed with great artistic skill. Mr. Hopkins effectively showed the capabilities of the organ, in respect to the execution of classical music, whilst the adaptability of the instrument for the expressive rendering of church music, as exemplified in the hymns played by the Organist, Mr. T. Pulleyn, was fully displayed.

GOLCAR.—On Saturday evening, the 12th ult., a musical Festival was given in the Baptist Chapel by the Golcar Choral Society and the Chapel choir, assisted by members of the Huddersfield Choral Society and other local vocalists and instrumentalists, together making up a band and chorus of about 150. The solo vocalists were Miss Smythe, Mr. T. H. Beaumont, and Mr. W. Martin. Mr. J. H. Pearson presided at the organ, and Mr. Henry Pearson conducted. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from the Creation, and the second of selections from the Redemption, an Oratorio compiled from different works of Handel's, and both parts were interspersed with organ solos by Mr. J. H. Pearson. As an introduction the band and organist played the Andante movement from Haydn's Surprise Symphony. The choruses were sung with admirable spirit and precision, "The heavens are telling" and "Achieved is the glorious work" being especially noteworthy.

HARROGATE.—An excellent Choral Society has been recently established in this town. Already above 100 members have been enrolled, and Bennett's My Queen is being rehearsed, under the conductorship of Mr. R. S. Burton.

HERTFORD.—On Tuesday, the 15th ult., a most successful entertainment was given by the St. Andrew's Choral Society and the Hertford Shakespearean Reading Society. The programme consisted of a large portion of Macbeth, interspersed with Locke's music, excellently rendered by the Choral Society, and Mr. Holmes, Miss Scales, Miss Silversides, Miss Oram, Mrs. Durrant, Messrs. Hervey, Neeves, and Durrant. Mr. Holmes, Organist of St. Andrew's Church, conducted.

ILFRACOMBE.—On Monday, January 31, after the ordinary practice of the Ilfracombe Choral Society, Mr. B. P. Willis, who has for some time been honorary Conductor of this Association, was presented by the members with a testimonial, as an earnest of their appreciation of his valuable services. The Vicar, after a highly complimentary speech, said that they were all naturally desirous to let their chief know that they were thankful to him for what he had done, and he had, therefore, great pleasure in handing to Mr. Willis the purse he then held, containing fifteen sovereigns. Mr. Willis, who was completely taken by surprise, returned thanks in a few words, saying that he was extremely obliged for the kindness done him, and thanking the members for the hearty and consistent manner in which they had worked with him. It was also mentioned that an illuminated address is to be presented to Mr. Willis with the following inscription: "We, the undersigned members and subscribers take this opportunity of expressing our gratitude to Mr. B. P. Willis for his labours on behalf of the Ilfracombe Choral Society, and beg his acceptance of the accompanying purse, in token of our esteem and appreciation of his valuable services as honorary Conductor of this Society."

LANCASTER.—Madame Lemmens-Sherrington gave a Ballad Concert on the 9th ult., assisted by Madame Enriquez, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. Bridson.—The Lancaster Choral Society under the direction of Mr. F. Dean is actively engaged in rehearsing Gade's En-king's Daughter, which, with a miscellaneous selection, is to form the material for the next Concert.—The Burton-in-Lonsdale Choral Society has placed in rehearsal the Ode to the North-east Wind, by Alice Mary Smith. Mr. Aldous, of Lancaster, is the Conductor.

LIMERICK.—The second Concert of the Limerick Musical Society was given at the Athenæum on Thursday evening, the 17th ult., under the direction of the Conductor, Mr. Joseph Smith, Mus. Bac. The programme included Dr. Arthur Sullivan's Festival Te Deum, and a setting of the 95th Psalm which was awarded the first prize of the London Church Choir Association in 1879, composed by Mr. Smith. The orchestral works included Beethoven's Symphony in C major, and a "Concertmarch," the work of Mr. W. Ringrose Atkins, of Cork, in which the band of the 57th Infantry Regiment ably assisted, together with the orchestra and organ; the composer conducting. The piece was received with great enthusiasm, and loudly encored.

LINCOLN.—In the Free Methodist Chapel, Saxon Street, on the 13th ult., Services were held in connection with the opening of the new organ, built by Mr. H. Jackson, of Lincoln. Mr. J. Turner Smith, Organist of the parish church, Skipton, Yorkshire, presided, and brought out the fine qualities of the instrument with good effect.—On Monday, the 14th ult., Mr. John Farmer's Oratorio, Christ and His Soldiers, was performed by an efficient choir, Mr. Williams, Organist of Wesley Chapel, ably presiding.

OLDHAM.—On Tuesday evening, the 8th ult., a Concert with readings was given in the Co-operative Hall, King Street, to a very large audience. The vocal music was rendered by Mr. J. Greaves's Choral Society, Miss Greaves, and Mr. Springthorpe. Mr. J. Greaves accompanied.

SALISBURY.—The members of the Salisbury Vocal Union gave a Concert in the Assembly Rooms on the 1st ult., to a large and highly appreciative audience. The special feature of the Concert was the unaccompanied part-singing of the Society. The solo vocalists, Miss Copp, Messrs. Wade, Hayden, and Crick, were highly successful in their songs. The solo pianists were Misses R. and F. Thomas, and the accompanists Misses Parsons, Sutton, and Davis. Mr. John M. Hayden conducted the Concert, which was in every respect a complete success.

SOUTHAMPTON.—A fine performance of the Messiah was given at St. Mary's Church on Friday, the 18th ult., under the conductorship of Dr. Arnold, of Winchester. It being the first time of an oratorio performance within a church, the event attracted considerable attention. A small band, led by Mr. C. Fletcher, supplemented the organ played by Mr. Sharp. The solo vocalists were Miss Sumner, Miss Wakefield, Mr. McCheane, and the Rev. W. Duncombe, of Hereford.

SOUTHPORT.—Mdlle. Laporte's début on Thursday evening, the 3rd ult., at the Cambridge Hall, was a marked success. Her four songs were sung in a manner so finished as to call forth warm applause from a large audience. The pianoforte playing of Miss K. Ockleston, and Mr. De Jong's flute solos were also features of the selection. Mr. Thurley Beale contributed some songs, which were well received.

STOCKBRIDGE.—On Friday, the 4th ult., a Concert was given in the Schoolroom, in aid of the funds of the Stockbridge Social Club, with much success. Messrs. R. and J. Dear, Wells-Lillyman, and Mrs. Brown received unanimous encores for their songs. The pianoforte pieces were well rendered by the Misses Dixon and Miss Butler, as also were some songs by Miss Edwards. Mr. Brown gave two cornet solos in a very artistic manner.

TROWBRIDGE.—Mr. H. Millington's fourth Subscription Concert was given, with great success, on Tuesday, the 1st ult., on which occasion he was assisted by Miss Marian Burton, Mr. H. Horscroft, Mr. L. Waite, and a local band and chorus. A well selected and diversified programme was performed to the satisfaction of the subscribers and general audience.

WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND.—Handel's Oratorio, the Messiah, was performed by the choir of St. Peter's Church, almost in its entirety as part of a religious service, in the church, on December 22. The experiment was a new one in Wellington, but proved successful. One feature of especial difficulty which presented itself, was that the Oratorio had to be given for the first time here without a conductor, the choir-master, Mr. Angelo Forrest, presiding at the organ. Notwithstanding this disadvantage, the choruses were sung with remarkable precision and steadiness. The solos were taken by amateurs, all members of the choir. Mr. Forrest's magnificent execution of the accompaniments arranged by Best, from Mozart's additions to Handel's score, excited general admiration. He also performed, as an introductory voluntary, the first two movements of Mendelssohn's Second (Lobgesang) Symphony, in B flat; as an offertorium, Spohr's Nocturne in F (Op. 34); and, at the conclusion, Batiste's grand Offertoire in C minor.

WEYBRIDGE.—A Concert was given at the Literary Institute on Tuesday evening, the 15th ult., under the direction of Mr. J. H. Cornish, Organist of the church of St. Michael and All Angels, assisted by a few friends. A varied programme was excellently performed. Songs were given by Miss Edith Maas, Mr. W. B. Morton, Mr. A. Colbourne, Mr. G. Doughty, and Mr. C. Alexander; and pianoforte and clarinet solos were admirably played by M. de Fontaine and Mr. J. O'Brien. Mr. Cornish is to be congratulated upon the results of this his first Concert.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The second Concert this season of the Festival Choral Society was given on Wednesday evening, January 26, in the Agricultural Hall. The programme was charming in its variety and quality. The instrumental executants were Madame Norman-Néruda, M. Vieuxtemps, and Mr. Hallé. The vocalists were Miss Clara Samuël, who was highly successful in Sterndale Bennett's "Dawn, gentle flower," and Bache's "Lebewohl"; and Mr. Hilton who sang Gounod's characteristic song "The Valley" with taste and feeling. The singing of the choir was exceptionally good, especially in Leslie's "Lullaby of Life" and Hatten's "Tar's Song." Dr. A. H. Mann accompanied, and Mr. Stockley conducted. The instrument used was one of Messrs. Broadwood's "iron grans."

WOODFORD WELLS.—A special evening Service was held at All Saints' Church, on the 9th ult., at which Farmer's Oratorio, Christ and His Soldiers, was performed as the anthem, Mr. Austin Blake (Organist of the church) conducting, and Mr. Smith (of Loughton) presiding at the organ. The choruses were well sung by the choir of the church, augmented by some members of the congregation; and the solos were most ably rendered by Miss Trevena, Mr. Sidney Barnby (of St. Paul's Cathedral), and Mr. Prenton (of the Bencher's Chapel, Gray's Inn).

WORCESTER.—Prevented by the recent fire from holding his Concert, as originally announced, at the Music Hall, Mr. Spark was fortunate in obtaining the use of the Shire Hall for the evening of the 17th ult. The principal vocalists were Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Madame Vogri (who has a fine contralto voice), Madame Sinico, Signori Vidal, Susini, and Campobello; and the instrumentalists, Herr Lowenthal (pianoforte), and Herr Marcell Herwegh (violin). The Concert was highly successful, and Mr. Spark is to be congratulated on the enterprise which he has displayed during the season, and the appreciation which has rewarded his endeavours.

YORK.—The third and last Concert for the season, of the Musical Society, was given on Wednesday evening, the 9th ult., to an audience filling the concert-room in every part. The programme was miscellaneous. The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Trebelli, Signor Vizzani, and Signor Zoboli. Signor Bisaccia contributed pianoforte solos, and also played the accompaniments in a very judicious manner. M. Ovide Musin was very successful in his violin solos, and the singing of the part-songs by the chorists reflected the highest credit on Mr. Burton, the Conductor.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. B. Vine Westbrook, Organist and Choirmaster to Holy Trinity, Greenwich.—Mr. T. A. Barrett, Organist and Choirmaster to St. John's Cathedral, Salford.—Mr. D. Colley, Organist and Choirmaster to Dunham-Massey Church, Cheshire.—Miss E. L. McKnight, to the Parish Church, Alfreton.—Mr. Fred.

Monk, Organist and Choirmaster to Holy Trinity Church, Lyne, Chertsey.—Mr. W. T. Essex, to the Church of St. Bartholomew's Hospital.—Mr. John Francis FitzGerald, Mus. Bac., to the Cathedral, Waterford.—Mr. G. Hermann Lott, to St. Mary, Plympton, South Devon.—Mr. Oswald J. Smiles, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Cheshunt.—Mr. F. Herbert Taylor, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary's Church, South Shields.

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

J. CURWEN AND SONS' LIST.

STUDIES IN WORSHIP MUSIC, by J. SPENCER CURWEN, A.R.A.M., gives the history of congregational singing in the Church of England and the various Nonconforming bodies; contains advice on the use of the organ and harmonium in worship, on chanting, on harmonies for Congregational music, on the notation of hymn tunes, on training boys' voices, and on training congregations; describes seventeen typical services in London churches, thus collating the practice of the best organists and choirmasters. "A good deal of interesting information has been got together, which those who are interested in the subject would do well to study."—Fall Mail Gazette. "A record of the past, a chronicle of the present, and a valuable means of reference for the future."—Monthly Musical Record. "A work which is evidently the result both of patient labour and earnest thought."—Musical Times. Price 5s.

MECHANISM OF THE HUMAN VOICE, by EMIL BEHNKE, Lecturer on Vocal Physiology at the Tonic Sol-fa College. Second edition, enlarged and partially rewritten. Price 3s. "In clear and untechnical language the author gives an accurate account of the construction and mode of action of the human larynx."—Medical Press and Circular. The author's successful lectures in all parts of the country have necessitated the rapid issue of the second edition, which has been improved and revised.

RED RIDING HOOD'S RESCUE, a Drawing-room Operetta for School Parties and Festivals. The words by John Guard; the music by J. A. BROAD. "A very prettily written cantata. The tuneful music is adapted for children's voices."—The Graphic. Teachers find the ordinary school cantatas too difficult for young children. The easiness of its music recommends this cantata no less than its tunefulness. Price, staff notation, pianoforte score, 1s. 3d.; Tonic Sol-fa, vocal score, 6d. The right of performance granted to all purchasers without charge.

TEXT-BOOK OF COUNTERPOINT, by GEORGE OAKLEY, Mus. Bac., Cantab. Second edition, revised. Mr. Ebenezer Prout says: "It gives us, within the space of 32 pages, a résumé of the whole subject of simple counterpoint, which is at once concise and clear." Price 1s.

STANDARD ANTHEMS, by MACFARREN, SMART, HOPKINS, and LAHEE. Eleven numbers ready. List gratis on application.

EIGHTY MUSICAL SENTENCES to illustrate chromatic chords, by G. A. MACFARREN, M.A., Mus. Doc., Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, and Principal of the Royal Academy of Music. Third edition. Price 3s.

POPULAR MUSIC in the Staff Notation, embracing Anthems, Choruses, Glee, &c. List gratis.

THE CHORAL SINGER, a course of practice in the Staff Notation, on the principles of progression and arrangement adopted in the Tonic Sol-fa method, by JOHN CURWEN and J. SPENCER CURWEN. A teacher writes: "This is the most carefully graduated course of exercises and pieces that I have met with." Price 1s.

JACK AND THE BEANSTALK

A COMIC CANTATA BY

EDMUND ROGERS

Three Shillings net.

"The Cantata is a very good thing in its way, and will, if we mistake not, have a wide acceptance. Four solo voices (S.A.T.B.) and chorus are called into requisition for its performance; and the music, although written in a humorous spirit, is never coarse. On the other hand it is tuneful, never flags for a moment, and is composed throughout with the ease and fluency of an accustomed hand."—The Queen.

WORKS ON PLAIN-SONG, ETC.

BY THE

REV. THOMAS HELMORE.

Now complete, the Super-Royal 18mo Edition of

THE MANUAL OF PLAIN-SONG

CONTAINING

- I. A BRIEF DIRECTORY for Morning and Evening Prayer, Litany, and Holy Communion. Sold separately, 2d.
 - II. THE CANTICLES NOTED, First Set, 4d.
 - III. THE CANTICLES NOTED, Second Set, 8d.
- N.B.—In these three portions of the Manual there are 22 settings of the Venite; 8 of the Te Deum; 14 of the Benedicite; 14 of the Benedictus; 2 of the Jubilate; 1 of the Easter Anthem instead of the Venite; 2 of the Miserere; 12 of the Quicunque vult; 17 of the Magnificat; 2 of the Cantate Domino; 18 of the Nunc dimittis; 2 of the Deus misereatur; to which an endless variety may be added, if required, by following the directions of the closing portion of this Manual. (See below, VII.)
- IV. THE PSALTER NOTED; the widely disseminated and earliest portion of the Manual, published with its Accompanying Harmonies in 1849.
 - V. THE FIRST APPENDIX TO THE PSALTER NOTED; being the Proper Psalms for Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, and the four Great Festivals, set to the same Tones as before, but placed in their proper order, for greater convenience.
- IV. and V. together, 2s. 6d.
- VI. THE SECOND APPENDIX TO THE PSALTER NOTED; the Psalms for the Four Greater Festivals reset to different Tones. 4d.
 - VII. THE THIRD APPENDIX TO THE PSALTER NOTED, 6d.; completing the design of which the foregoing have successively furnished the other component parts. Herein are ample directions for changing one Tone for another, with a proper rearrangement of the words. Also a Table in which all the Tones, or Chants, used in the Manual and its Accompanying Harmonies are classified according to their similarity of accent and form; thus showing which are most conveniently interchangeable for the same words, and a similar number of accents.

N.B.—These seven parts are now to be had in one neat volume, cloth, price 4s. 6d.; and those not contained in the former incomplete Manual may be had as a second volume by such as do not require the earlier parts. This Manual may thus be had, either in one complete volume, price 4s. 6d.; or, as before, in the incomplete form, Vol. I. containing the "Brief Directory," "First Set of Canticles," "Psalter," and "First Appendix" (i.e., the old Manual), 3s. 6d.; and the remaining parts forming Vol. II., i.e., "Second Set of Canticles," 8d.; "Second Appendix to the Psalter Noted," 4d.; and the "Third Appendix," just now published, and completing the "Manual of Plain-Song," 6d.—price 2s. 6d. The several Numbers of this work will be still kept on sale, in six separate parts, IV. and V. constituting but one.

The greater portion of this Manual was, from the first, published also in Super-Royal 8vo; and it is hoped that encouragement may be given for the completion of that larger-sized and handsome edition, suited alike for the Bookcase and the Organ and Choir Desks.

The Manual has also, as its companion Book of Words only, the "Canticles Accented," price 3d., and the same, together with the "Psalter Accented," price 1s. 6d. paper; 2s. 6d. cloth; and they are also bound up with the Small Pica 16mo Oxford Edition of the Book of Common Prayer, in a convenient and portable volume, most suitable for general use, 5s.

The Manual has its Accompanying Harmonies, partly corresponding to the Seven Portions of which it consists, thus:—

- No. I. has THE ACCOMPANYING HARMONIES TO THE BRIEF DIRECTORY, with an explanatory Preface, 1s. 6d.; also
 - THE FIRST APPENDIX TO THE ACCOMPANYING HARMONIES TO THE BRIEF DIRECTORY. 4d.
 - Nos. II., III., IV., and V. have Accompanying Harmonies in THE SECOND APPENDIX TO THE ACCOMPANYING HARMONIES TO THE BRIEF DIRECTORY. 2s.
 - THE ACCOMPANYING HARMONIES TO THE PSALTER NOTED, and its FIRST APPENDIX. 3s.
- This First Appendix separate, 4d.
- No. VI. has THE ACCOMPANYING HARMONIES TO THE SECOND APPENDIX TO THE PSALTER NOTED. 4d.
 - No. VII. as II., III., IV., and V. above.
- There are also some Special Accompaniments to certain Canticles, viz., to the—
- TE DEUM, Nos. VII. and VIII., from BAINI and ALFIERI. Folio, 3s.
- MAGNIFICAT, Nos. VII. and XV., from ORLANDO DI LASSO. 8vo, each 4d.; and No. VIII., from PALESTRINA, 8vo, 8d.

Published under the sanction of the Ecclesiological Society.

THE HYMNAL NOTED.

THE ART OF PLAYING AT SIGHT. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.

"Considering the number of persons who are taught to play the piano, it is astonishing how few can 'read' music. The author attributes this to the fact that no system is put forth by teachers. The method advocated in this little book is a novel one, and will undoubtedly produce success if persevered in."

"The author believes his system to be infallible; after a fair trial, we must say we believe so too."

TESTIMONIAL

BERTHOLD TOURS, Esq.

"Your Lamp is a most ingenious contrivance, and only requires to be known to be universally adopted."

TESTIMONIAL

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, Esq.

"I have great pleasure in speaking of my experience of the admirable manner in which your Pianoforte Lamp illuminates the music; it is by far the best thing of the kind so far as I know."

REGISTERED.

"A very ingenious application of lamp-light to the desk of the pianoforte, harmonium, or organ has been registered by Mr. Thomas Ward. The lamp is so contrived, that it may be screwed on to any instrument, in a central position, so as to throw the full force of the light direct upon the music, the present system of side lights causing a waste of a great part of the illuminating power."—Illustrated London News.

Sir Julius Benedict. The successful candidates will be entitled to One Year's Gratuitous Instruction in Pianoforte and Harmony in the School. Candidates must be between the ages of 14 and 18, and must call on the Principal, bringing music they can perform, on any Saturday morning, between 10 and 1 o'clock, when they will be entered if sufficiently competent. Examination: Candidates will be required to play Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso, or a portion thereof; a piece of their own selection, and to read a portion of a piece at sight. A new feature during the present year will be the establishment of a Junior Class for Pianoforte, limited to a dozen pupils between the ages of 9 and 14, who must possess decided talent. This class will be under the personal superintendence of the Principal, who will take special interest in developing and encouraging the musical taste before any bad habits have been acquired. At the conclusion of a twelve-months' tuition a Scholarship will be competed for, entitling the successful competitor to a year's gratuitous instruction. Candidates must call on the Principal, bringing music they can perform, any Saturday Morning during the month of April, from 10 to 1. Fee for the term,

LOCAL EXAMINATIONS IN ELEMENTARY MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

Local Centres, under the care of Honorary Local Secretaries, have been established throughout the United Kingdom and the British Colonies.

The next Local Examinations in Elementary Musical Knowledge will take place on FRIDAY, June 17, 1881, and will be open to persons of either sex.

National Prizes of the values of £5 and £3 will be open to Candidates in each Division, Senior and Junior. The Examiners are also prepared to undertake the adjudication of certain Local Prizes.

The entrance-fee for every Candidate not connected with an Institution enrolled in union with the College is Five Shillings. The entrance-fee for every Candidate connected with an Institution in union is One Shilling. Honorary Members of the College who may be officially connected with an Institution can obtain the enrolment of such Institution in union without fee.

The Local Examinations are conducted as follows: The Examination Papers, inclosed in a sealed packet, are opened by the Local Secretary in the presence of the Candidates, and, at the close of the Examination, the work of the Candidates is placed in a cover, sealed up in their presence, and sent the same day to the Registrar of the College.

The Examinations are conducted in two divisions, Senior and Junior. The Examination Paper in the Senior Division is devoted to Elementary Theory, with a few historical questions. The Examination Paper in the Junior Division is limited to questions in notation, time, clefs, signatures, scales, terms, &c., and (in the Honours Section only) one or two easy historical questions will be set. Candidates may take their choice of entering for the Senior or Junior Division without consideration of age. Candidates born before the 12th of June, 1864, are not eligible for Prizes or other Honours in the Junior Division, but they may obtain the ordinary certificates with "special mention."

Candidates must send in their names (in full), with the entrance-fees, to the Local Secretary for the District not later than May 7, 1881.

The Regulations may be had of the Secretary, Trinity College, London, W.

THE MUSIC OF ANTON DVORÁK

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

IN considering the music of the Bohemian composer who, at forty years, has just come down to the footlights of the world's stage from the background of Prague, it is advisable to begin by separating the material into two grand divisions. Dvorák is eminently a national composer, and in the mass his utterances are couched in the national dialect. The reasons for this are not obscure. Till Brahms introduced him to cosmopolitan society in Vienna, he was in art as in blood a Czech. To his own countrymen he looked for such support as he seemed likely to get, and to them he appealed by means of Czech operas, arrangements of popular melodies, and the employment of national themes in the higher forms of his art. Independently of this, however, there is no room to doubt that Dvorák has much love for the characteristic music of his people and the diversified races bordering on the part of Europe in which they dwell. He may think—and, if so, he is not far wrong—that the melodic element in his art needs to recruit itself more and more by going to the source from which even its most cultured forms originally sprang. But whether he hold this opinion or not, the result of his work must be to strengthen the movement which is now so eagerly drawing thematic material from folk-music, and to enrich the common musical language of all countries with new, diversified, and precious resources.

Let us then look, in the first instance, at some of Dvorák's compositions which have obviously, not to say ostentatiously, derived their inspiration from local sources. We will begin with some examples of vocal music—a department in which, excluding the Bohemian operas, the master has not been as prolific as in that of instrumental work. A set of seven "Gipsy Songs" (Op. 55) does not serve our purpose, perhaps, as regards melody, since we may assume that these pieces belong to Dvorák only as far as their accompaniment extends. But they afford ample indication of the profound sympathy the composer has for such wayward and characteristic themes, and his own, we had almost said natural, fitness for dealing with them. The very essence of the spirit of one joyous ditty, "I chant my lay," is expressed in the opening bars of the prelude:—

Ped. Ped.

With equal aptness Dvorák shows how he appreciates the independence of tonality often noticeable in gipsy music. Seizing upon this feature we sometimes find him introducing it where not absolutely demanded by the melody itself. Thus, one piece, "Songs my mother taught me," opens with a simple diatonic theme in D major, but in his introduction the composer coquets with B minor, making also a most touching and pathetic passage out of the first bar of the vocal melody. It should be noted that Dvorák affects the peculiar form of syncopation here shown, and has used it again and again in his piano-forte works:—

Ped. Ped. Ped. Ped.

The master's method when dealing with national music is more fully shown in a set of thirteen duets for soprano and alto, entitled "Echoes of Moravia." Taking one of these at random we discover a trait as subtle as it is beautiful. A lover, separated from his mistress, sends her a greeting by a bird, and his unrest and longing are suggested at the outset by the frequent use of inverted chords, prominently of the 6-4-2. Here is a passage in proof:—

pp Andante. cres.

Speed thee, bird - ie, fly a - cross the wooded

vale be - yond, speed thee, bird - ie.

But when the lover prays Heaven that he may rejoin the object of his affection, something of hope and strength flashes out in the harmonic change:—

O that Heav'n would grant me . . . with my heart's be -

On this day would grant me . . .

- lov'd t'exchange a greet - ing fond. &c.

Changes of this sort are extremely characteristic of the composer. In another of the Moravian duets, where a lover praises his mistress for her beauty, and she insists only upon her truth, the prelude contains a minor ninth in four out of six bars, its plaintive effect being noticeable also when the voice enters. The object is clear. As the mostly diatonic harmonies of the continuation proceed, cresc. and string., the precise impression desired arises out of contrast:—

Larghetto.

Sweeter than the vio - let, Is my gentle maid - en,

Stringendo.

With the ro - ses dawn-ing blushes Fresh and comely

are her fair cheeks lad - en.

A further example of delicate art is found in a duet which represents a young couple alternately despairing and hoping as to their future. In the end they part, more in despair than hope, but with mutual vows of eternal truth. Here we have, to express the situation, a gradual lowering of the pitch of the voices: alternation from major to minor, and vice versa; frequent change of key, and a final close not in the tonic (A minor), but in the dominant. The charm of this combination seems to us complete:—

Allegro.

When wilt thou, my heart's de-light, wilt thou be ev - er true. Here's my hand, fare-well, my love, and may we nev - er rue, And wilt thou, my heart's delight, oh!

wilt thou be true? Here's my hand, farewell, my love, And be thou ev - er true.

Here's my hand, fare-well, my love, And may we nev - er rue.

In yet another instance, a rejected lover wishes the grass were ripe for cutting, that he might go into the fields and in labour forget suffering. When the duet begins, his agitation is pictured by a "figure" which appears in the brief introduction:—

Allegro.

and is prominent in every bar, even when contemplation of the "sweet pastures" diverts the lover's thoughts. But how different its effect here:—

p Sweet pastures smil - ing,

Another passage in the same duet deserves notice for its singular pathos—we had well nigh said its desolate effect, and the expression certainly applies to the concluding phrase. The first two bars quoted below are three times repeated to the words there given:—

p Till the love had perished,
I so fond-ly cherished, For my dearest loves me not. &c.

The use of the last three chords, with the unresolved discord bringing in the agitated "figure," is masterful.

Turning from characteristic pieces to others in which Dvorák takes up classic ground, we see him to even greater advantage, and not unworthy, in some instances, of comparison with Schubert. Among a set of four Lieder for voice and pianoforte (Op. 3), one song "Mir traumt dass du gestorben bist," stands out conspicuous in its sombre grandeur. Its subject would have inspired Schubert's most mournful and passionate strains, but Dvorák has left nothing to desire—save, perhaps, a less obvious suggestion of the first movement in Beethoven's C sharp minor sonata. The effect, it will be observed in the passage cited below, is due rather to harmonic than melodic means—a feature often noticeable in the composer's vocal pieces:—

Mit Blu - men war dein Sarg - ge schmückt dein Grab mit ei - nem, Stei - - ne. Und dass ich drauf ein Vers - lein schrieb bin ich . . . bin ich . . . er - su - chet fei . . .

A parallel and even more striking case is presented by a song called "Der Herr erschuf das Menschenherz," belonging to the same set. In this instance the composer is returning from a visit to the more distant members of the "tone-family," and wishes to reach the major of his key (E minor) for a Coda. This is how, through rich and glowing harmony, he makes his way:—

Più mosso.

We may close these references to Dvorák's vocal pieces by giving an example of one among their most obvious characteristics—that is to say, frequent modulation. Our illustration is taken from "Der Schmerz," a duet for equal voices forming one of a set of four (Op. 38). Each phrase of the quotation ends in a different key:—

Andante.
Als der Ap fel reif war, &c.

Turning now to Dvorák's works for the pianoforte alone, we find the composer's strong partiality for national and folk-music once more asserted. Here, however, owing to the greater freedom allowed, he uses popular themes chiefly as material for treatment secundum artem, after the manner so frequently adopted by Schubert, between whom and Dvorák the points of comparison are many. An excellent example may be found in a piece entitled "Furiante," founded on a Bohemian national dance. The dance-tune itself consists of not more than two eight-bar phrases:—

Allegro con fuoco.

With this simple and pretty theme our composer deals charmingly. After announcing the leading section, he constructs upon the first two measures a new melody similar in progression, but with a rhythm of seven bars; then, following a short episode, the first part of the theme is repeated in a varied form, and a codetta made upon its last three notes:—

—these two bars being three times repeated. The figure in the bass being taken up by the right hand, leads to the second section of the theme, which is duly announced and treated in a fashion strongly suggestive of the Vienna master, to whom we have already likened him of Prague. Schubert was addicted to repeating his subjects in different keys consecutively, so, here, Dvorák jumps from G major to E major, and thence to F sharp major, giving the theme in each tonality. Then the subject twice reappears in G, once for the left hand, and a bravura leads back to the first section. Dvorák now proceeds to further development of this part of his subject, taking it up in fragments. He sets out with the first two bars in this modified form:—

and again begins leaping or rather, in this case, gliding from key to key. From G the phrase passes to E minor, C major, A minor, and back to G. This done a fragment of the phrase—

after which the entire theme again appears with its codetta and a return is made to the second section now in D major. This is worked out as a Coda to the whole.

We have dwelt thus at length upon the “Furiante” in D, because it exemplifies some of our composer’s most common characteristics—viz., the subordination of popular melodic elements to classic form, economy of thematic material, extreme partiality to tonal transitions, and entire freedom from the obscurity brought about by overcrowded details.

A second “Furiante,” in F, also founded upon a Bohemian dance-tune, is not so rich in illustrative matter, but contains one characteristic passage, which should not pass unnoticed, since it strengthens the examples already given of Dvorák’s fondness for Schubert, of his economical tendency to make themes go as far as possible, and of his indulgence in a restless tonality. The theme is in F, but a full close has been reached in A flat, and what follows is a codetta:—

We next come to a piece entitled “Dumka”—in English, “Elegy”—the name given by Dvorák, as some amateurs may remember, to a movement in his Sestet, and another in his Quartet in E flat. Here, also, we meet with exhaustive treatment of fragments taken from the main theme. Substantially this theme is one of three bars only:—

but throughout an entire section the melody of the first bar is alone heard variously modified. This example of our composer is valuable enough for quotation entire:—

Subsequently, this much-used scrap of tune is introduced and expanded in four different forms. First:—

Second:—

Third:—

Fourth:—

A better example of how a germ expands and brings forth in Dvorák's hands, for the purposes of a mere bagatelle, could hardly be presented. We find another scarcely less interesting in No. 8 of a set of twelve pieces, entitled "Silhouetten" (Op. 8). The distinctive notes of the theme are these:—

And they reappear, after the subject has been fully stated, under the subjoined new conditions:—

—the passage being six times repeated, each time in a new key, after what we now thoroughly understand as Dvorák's manner. But when this section recurs as a Coda, our composer, by a simple change in the bass, gives it a new character:—

We will add to the foregoing only an illustration of Dvorák's more wayward, yet withal graceful, melody. It occurs in No. 3 of the "Silhouetten," and is given with a careful transcription of the phrasing:—

Thus much for the Prague master as a writer of music for the voice and for the piano. In another and concluding paper we shall follow him into the higher branches of his art.

MR. PEPYS THE MUSICIAN

By FRANCIS HUEFFER.

IV.

BEFORE passing on to more important matters, it is necessary to mention one or two more instruments which formed part of the Pepysian collection, or of which he had at least personal cognisance. We have already seen that his intended purchase of an organ came to nothing. A similar fate and for similar reasons frustrated his transactions for the acquisition of a harpsicon, of which an account is given in the following passage:—

"March 23, 1668. To the tavern and there bespoke wine for dinner, and so to Bishopsgate Streete, thinking to have found a Harpsicon maker, but he is gone, and I have a mind forthwith to have a little Harpsicon made me, to confirm and help me in my musique notions, which my head is now-a-days full of, and I do believe will come to something very good."

Unfortunately Mr. Pepys does not record the name of the instrument-maker in Bishopsgate Street. He, on the other hand, mentions that of another manufacturer sufficiently familiar to those interested in the subject. "To Whitehall," he writes less than a fortnight later. "Took Aldgate Street in my way, and there called upon one Hayward, that makes virginals, and there did like of a little espinette, and will have him finish it for me; for I had a mind to a small harpsichon, but this takes up less room."

Mr. Pepys, however, was not a man to be hurried into a bargain. Several months afterwards we still find him haggling over the same spinet. "I to buy my espinette," he writes, July 13 of the same year, "which I did now agree for, and did at Haward's meet with Mr. Thacker, and heard him play on the Harpsichon so as I never heard man before, I think;" and two days later we hear that the instrument has been brought home, and that its price is five pounds. The list of seventeenth century instrument-makers may be enriched by another harmonious name, that of Mr. Drumbleby, whose specialty seems to have been the flute. "To Drumbleby's, the pipe-maker," Mr. Pepys writes, January 20, 1668, "there to advise about the making of a flageolet to go low and soft; and he do show me a way which do do, and also a fashion of having two pipes of the same note fastened together, so as I can play on one and then echo it upon the other, which is mighty pretty."

The same Drumbleby soon after supplies a recorder "which I do intend to learn to play on, the sound of it being, of all sounds in the world, most pleasing to me." It will be seen that the instruments of the Pepysian collection which have already been mentioned, and to which the lute ("Up before 4 o'clock and so to my lute") may be added, included most of the components of the orchestra as it existed in those days.

To bring this part of the subject to a dramatic climax, it will be well to mention the tremendous instrument which went by the still more tremendous name of trump-marine.

"October 24, 1667. To Charing Cross there to see Polichinelli, but it being begun, we in to see a Frenchman, at the house where my wife's father last lodged, one Monsieur Prin, play on the trump-marine, which he do beyond belief; and, the truth is it do so far outdo a trumpet as nothing more, and he do play anything very true, and it is most admirable and at first was a mystery to me that I should hear a whole concert of chords together at the end of a pause, but he showed me that it was only when the last notes were 5ths or 3rds one to another and then their sounds like an Echo did last so as they seemed to sound all together. The instrument is open at the end I discovered; but he would not let me look into it."

The trump or more correctly the trumpet marine is referred to at considerable length by Hawkins (Novello, Ewer and Co.'s edition, pages 329, 605, 763), who in the last-named place quotes an extract from the London Gazette (February 4, 1674) giving an account of "a concert of four Trumpets Marine never heard of before in England"; a statement which is rectified by the passage above quoted. Glareanus, in his "Dodecachordon," states that the instrument was much in vogue amongst the Germans, French, and Netherlands. Virdung, Agricola, and other writers of the sixteenth century also give descriptions of it, but no satisfactory etymology of the name has as yet been supplied.

From the relation of facts we proceed to the record of opinions expressed in the Diary, and our respect for the author increases as we go on. Mr. Pepys, as every one knows, was not a professional musician, and the time which he could spare from his office-work was occupied by numerous interests, artistic, literary, and scientific. It is almost a truism to say that such variety of tastes leads as a rule to superficiality. The most catholic mind is not always the most profound. It is said of Hegel the philosopher that his pupils collectively used to proclaim him the most learned man in Europe; the philologists calling him the greatest historian, the artists the profoundest natural scholar; only in his own individual branch, each would add, the master was slightly deficient. With Mr. Pepys the reverse is the case, as far at least as the present writer can judge. Much has been made of the fact that he speaks of some of the plays of Shakespeare in a slighting manner; but it should be remembered that his remarks always are based on performances of those plays; and who can tell what those performances were like, or how much of Shakespeare's original was preserved in the acting version. The Restoration epoch was the anticlimax of the great dramatic age preceding it; and the worst that can be said against Mr. Pepys is that in a few instances he was misled by the depraved taste of his time. At any rate it should be remembered in his favour that against the opinion of the fashionable letterati he upheld the beauty of our popular ballads, many of which he preserved from destruction.

In musical matters his judgment was singularly correct, and perhaps in no other art is it more difficult to predict the permanent value of contemporary phenomena. Let the candid musical critic open an old newspaper and see in how many cases his opinions will bear the test of a ten years' interval. Mr. Pepys's criticisms have stood that of two centuries, and with few exceptions have been verified by posterity.

The soundness of Mr. Pepys's judgment is accounted for, amongst others, by the fact that he has that virtue rarest amongst critics—modesty. He did not immediately fall to abusing a thing merely because he did not understand it. Scotch music was such a thing. Ordinary Londoners in the seventeenth century knew less of Scotland than they now do of New Zealand. Even in the days of Goldsmith the Highlands were to the ordinary Englishman a wild, undiscovered country, from whose bourne few Southern travellers returned, because few went thither. Scotch (i.e., Celtic) manners, and morals, and music were equally unknown, and accordingly looked upon with suspicion. No wonder therefore that Mr. Pepys is a little startled when for the first time, not on the other side of a big hill, but at a civilised supper-party, he hears one of those weird strains of which Mr. Gilbert sings:

It was wild, it was fitful, as wild as the breeze,
It wandered about into several keys;
It was jerky, spasmodic, and harsh, I'm aware,
And yet it distinctly suggested an air.

Yet even in this extremely trying situation Mr. Pepys's critical equilibrium is not upset. He feels that here he has to deal with a new phenomenon, which cannot be judged of at first sight. So, instead of having recourse to abuse, and talking of barbarians and the like—as most of his contemporaries and some of our contemporaries would have done—he merely expresses his surprise in perhaps the most adequate terms that could have been used in the circumstances: "the strangest ayre that ever I heard in my life, and all of one cast." But the entire passage is well worth quoting:—

"July 28, 1666. Being come thither (i.e., to Highgate, where Lord Lauderdale's residence still stands) we went to Lord Lauderdale's house to speake with him . . . we find him and his Lady and some Scotch people at supper. Pretty odd company, though my Lord Brouncker tells me Lord Lauderdale is a man of mighty good reason and judgment. But at supper there played one of their servants upon the viallin some Scotch tunes only; several and the best of their country, as they seemed to esteem them by their praising and admiring them; but Lord! the strangest ayre that ever I heard in my life, and all of one cast. But strange to hear my Lord Lauderdale say himself that he had rather hear a cat mew than the best musique in the world;* and the better the musique the more sicke it makes him, and that of all the instruments he hates the lute most, and next to that the bagpipe."

The Earl, afterwards Duke of Lauderdale, was a bold, cruel man, as readers of "Old Mortality" and of history are aware. He must have needed all his courage to talk such heresy about bagpipes before a company of Scotch enthusiasts.

A single and not very instructive sentence contains all that Mr. Pepys has to say of Irish national tunes; it is in substantial and verbal agreement with his opinion of the Celtic music of the North. "Among other things," he writes, "Harris sang his Irish song, the strangest in itself, and the prettiest sung by him that ever I heard."

The Mr. Harris here referred to is an interesting character who frequently appears in the Diary. He was an actor, and originally belonged to Sir William Davenant's company, but growing, as Mr. Pepys says in another place, very proud, he demanded twenty pounds for himself more than Betterton or anybody else upon every new play, and ten pounds upon every revival, which Sir William refusing to give, he swore he would never act there more, in expectation of being received in the other house. Pepys was fond of him, and had his portrait painted by Hales. At the time when he sang the Irish song he was an actor of the Duke's playhouse, and evidently a man of great and varied culture. "I find him a very curious and understanding person in all pictures and other things, and a man of fine conversation." The entry from which the last extract is quoted, describes a musical party at Mr. Pepys's house, and is so merry and pleasing in tone that it deserves quotation, although, not immediately connected with the subject. The Mrs. Knipp, to be presently mentioned, was an actress of whom more will be said anon; Mercer, who sings the Italian song, is the musical handmaiden of Mrs. Pepys, already known to the reader.

* I had rather be a kitten and cry mew,
Than one of these same metre ballad-mongers.

Lord Lauderdale is evidently quoting Shakespeare more or less consciously.

"So away with all my company down to the office, and there fell to dancing, and continued at it an hour or two, there coming Mrs. Anne Jones, a merchant's daughter hard by, who dances well, and all in mighty good humour, and danced with great pleasure, and then sung and then danced, and then sung many things of three voices—both Harris and Rolt singing their parts excellently. Among other things Harris sang his Irish song, the strangest in itself, and the prettiest sung by him that ever I heard. Then to supper in the office, a cold good supper, and wondrous merry. Here was Mrs. Turner, also, and Mrs. Markham. After supper to dancing again, and singing, and so continued till almost three in the morning, and then with extraordinary pleasure broke up. Only towards morning Knipp fell a little ill, and so my wife home with her to put her to bed, and we continued dancing and singing; and among other things our Mercer unexpectedly did happen to sing an Italian song I know not, of which they two sung the other two parts too, that did almost ravish me and made me in love with her more than ever with her singing. As late as it was, yet Rolt and Harris would go home to-night, and walked it, though I had a bed for them. And it proved dark and a misty night, and very windy. The company being all gone to their homes, I up with Mrs. Pierce to Knipp, who was in bed, and we waked her and sung a song, and then left my wife to see Mrs. Pierce in bed to her, in our best chamber, and so to bed myself, my mind mightily satisfied with all this evening's work, and thinking it to be one of the merriest enjoyments I must look for in the world, and did content myself therefore with the thoughts of it, and so to bed; only the musique did not please me, they not being contented with less than 30s."

Fancy Mr. W. H. Smith taking actors and actresses to the Admiralty, and dancing and singing with them till three o'clock in the morning.

We have seen how Mr. Pepys in the above extract is "almost ravished" by an Italian song. His position towards the art of that country was however not that of unbounded admiration. In the common opinion of his age, which despised English art compared with the foreign article, he was by no means prepared to acquiesce, and it is just possible that patriotic indignation made him somewhat reluctant to acknowledge the real merits of Italian music. Another reason why that music did not at first appeal to him is too characteristic of the man to be omitted. It shows his attitude as a critic of vocal music in the most striking light: "Went with Knipp to Mrs. Manuel's, * where Mrs. Pierce was, and her boy and girl; and here I did hear Mrs. Manuel, and one of the Italians, her gallant, sing well. But yet I confess I am not delighted so much with it as to admire it; for not understanding the words I lose the benefit of the vocalities of the musick and it proves only instrumental; and therefore was more pleased to hear Knipp sing two or three little English things that I understood, though the composition of the other, and performance, was very fine." It will be seen that to Mr. Pepys words and music in a song were inseparable, and could not be enjoyed apart from each other. To the real merits of Italian art he was however by no means blind, and a few months after the last entry (March 22, 1668), we hear him speak in this exalted strain:—

"Here I met with Brisband, and after hearing the service at the King's Chapel, where I heard the Bishop of Norwich, Dr. Reynolds, the old presbyterian, begin a very plain sermon, he and I to the Queen's Chapel, and there did hear the Italians sing; and indeed their musick did appear most admirable to me beyond anything of our's: I was never so well satisfied in my life with it."

"Beyond anything of ours" may not be flattering to one's national pride, but it would be difficult to deny the justice of the criticism. Italy in those days was the heart and root of musical life just as Germany is now. There were in various countries branches with more or less indigenous fruit, but they all drew their nourishment from the common principle of life. Of this Mr. Pepys was well aware.

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. X.—BERLIOZ (continued from page 121).

At the close of the previous chapter we left Berlioz still enraptured with Gluck. We now see him just as he received his first stimulus to the musical romanticism wherein he was destined to find his true orbit and to shine as a star. A mutilated version of "Der Freischütz" having been brought out at the Odéon, under the name of "Robin des Bois," by M. Castil-Blaze, our young musician went to hear it. Let him describe the result in his own words:—

"This new style, against which my intolerant and exclusive cultus of grand classical works had at first prejudiced me, caused extreme surprise and ravishment, despite the manner in which the opera was presented. Turned upside down as it was, there exhaled from this work a wild aroma the delicious freshness of which intoxicated me. I had become a little fatigued, I admit, by the solemn manner of the tragic muse, and the rapid movements of the nymph of the woods, at times marked by gracious brusquerie, her dreamy attitudes, her naïve and virginal love, her chaste smile, her melancholy, overwhelmed with a torrent of sensations till then unknown."

Upon this Berlioz neglected the Opéra for the Odéon, and they could mutilate Gluck at the greater house without fear of the terrible young man in the pit.

A propos to "Robin des Bois," Berlioz launches all the thunderbolts of his invective and sarcasm at those who tamper with the works of great masters. After describing the scandalous fashion in which Mozart's "Die Zauberflöte" was treated by a German, Herr Lachnith, who produced a garbled version of that masterpiece in Paris as "Les Mystères d'Isis," he goes on to exclaim:—

"Mozart has been assassinated by Lachnith; Weber by Castil-Blaze, who has also mutilated Gluck, Grétry,

* Mrs. Manuel, in August, 1667, "the Jew's widow, formerly a player," and in March, 1668, "the Jew's wife, and a mighty discreet sober carriages woman."

Mozart, Rossini, Beethoven, Vogel, and others. Beethoven has seen his symphonies corrected by Fétis, Kreutzer, and Habeneck. Molière and Corneille have been hacked about by unknown people at the Théâtre Français, and Shakespeare is still represented in England as arranged by Cibber. The corrections here are not, it appears to me, made from the high to the low, but from the low to the high, and perpendicularly at that. Let no one say that the arrangers, in their dealing with the masters, have produced some happy results, because no exceptional consequences can justify the introduction into art of a monstrous immorality. No, no, no, ten million times no; musicians, poets, prose writers, actors, pianists, chefs d'orchestre of the third, second, or even of the first order, you have no right to touch Beethoven and Shakespeare, to make them almoner of your science and your taste. No, no, no, a thousand million times no; a man, be he who he may, has no right to force another man, be he who he may, to abandon his personality and take another; to express himself in a fashion which is not his own, to wear a form which he has not chosen, to become a manikin moved by another's will living, and galvanised after death. If the victim be a mediocrity, why not leave him alone in his mediocrity? If he be a great man, let his equals, and even his superiors, respect him, and let his inferiors bow humbly before him. . . . Is not all this ruin, entire destruction, the total end of art? And ought not we, who are impressed by the glory and jealous for the imprescriptible rights of the human spirit, to denounce the guilty, to pursue him, crying with all our might, 'Thy crime is ridiculous! Despair!! Thy stupidity is criminal! Die!! Be scouted, be spit upon, be accursed! Despair and die!!'

Our worthy "arrangers" will not find the seat of such feeling as they may possess reached by even the sharpest words; but it is a pleasure to reproduce the French master's anathema, even though he himself scored for orchestra Weber's "Invitation à la Valse."

After the revelation to Berlioz of Weber and his romanticism came that of Shakespeare and his embodied creations—came also that of irresistible artist-woman in the person of an Irish girl named Henrietta Smithson, one of an English theatrical company which ventured to play our national poet in the French capital. Of this new experience, Berlioz says:—

"I attended the first performance of 'Hamlet' at the Odéon, and saw in the rôle of Ophelia, Henrietta Smithson, who, five years later, became my wife. The effect of her prodigious talent, or rather of her dramatic genius, upon my imagination and heart is comparable only to the revolution wrought in me by the poet of whom she was the worthy interpreter. I can say no more than this."

Our master now suffered the agony of seemingly hopeless love. The symptoms need not be described, nor need we insist that an attempt to get rid of them by excessive bodily exertion failed. There was some comfort, however, in setting music to Tom Moore's "When he who adores thee," and more self-denial than knowledge of human nature in resolving to keep away from the Odéon. Of course, Berlioz did not keep away, and at every visit his unconscious enslaver riveted closer the chains that bound him. His state of mind, at this time, is most clearly shown in a letter to Ferdinand Hiller, dated Paris, 1829:—

"I must write to you again this evening; and the letter will perhaps not be more cheerful than the others. Never mind. Do you want to know what is the power of the emotion, the faculty of suffering, which kills me? Ask your own angel—the seraphim who has opened to you the gates of heaven. Let us not lament!—my fire is extinguished; wait an instant—O, my friend, do you know?—I have burned to relight it, my elegy in prose!—always tears, sympathetic tears; I see Ophelia at every turn; I hear her tragic voice; the light of her sublime eyes consumes me. O, my friend, I am very unhappy; my misery is inexpressible."

Addressing himself, the writer thus concludes:—

"Be tranquil, fool, in a few years there will be no more a question of thy sufferings than of that which thou callest the genius of Beethoven; the dreamy fancy of Weber; the passionate sensibility of Spontini; the colossal power of Shakespeare. Go, go, Henrietta Smithson and Hector Berlioz, be united in the forgetfulness of the grave; but that will not hinder others from suffering and dying."

Poor young man! he was very much in love.

But the tender passion, while it inflicted pain like a spur, stimulated like a spur to renewed effort. How could Berlioz, obscure and unknown, work his way to the side of the distinguished artist and attract her notice? That was the question which found an answer in the lover's resolution to give a concert of his own music so that thereby he might step out from the ranks of the indiscriminate crowd. It being desirable to give the concert at the Conservatoire, permission was asked and obtained from the Department of Fine Arts; but the redoubtable Cherubini proved less complaisant than his official superiors. Perhaps he had not forgotten the chase in the library. Let us see how the two men behaved in presence of each other this time:—

"C. You want to give a concert?"

"B. Yes, sir."

"C. You must have permission from the Superintendent of Fine Arts."

"B. I have obtained it."

"C. M. de Larocquefoucault consents?"

"B. Yes, sir."

"C. But I don't consent. I am against your having the hall."

"B. Why should you refuse. The Conservatoire holiday is now on, and for fifteen days the place will be free."

"C. But I will not let you give the concert. Everybody is in the country, and you will get no money by it."

"B. I don't expect to do so. The concert is intended to make me known."

"C. There is no need for you to be known. Besides you will want money for expenses. Have you got any?"

"B. Yes, sir."

"C. Ah! and what do you mean to perform?"

"B. Two overtures, parts of an opera, and my cantata, 'La Mort d'Orphée.'"

"C. That was the cantata I rejected. It is bad, it cannot be executed."

"B. So you say, sir, but I have my own opinion. If a bad pianist was unable to accompany it, that doesn't prove a good orchestra unable to play it."

"C. That's an insult to the Académie."

"B. It's a simple experience, sir. If the Académie was right in declaring my work impossible, of course it can't be performed. If, on the contrary, the Académie was wrong, people will say that I have profited by its advice and corrected the score."

"C. You can only give your concert on a Sunday."

"B. I will give it on a Sunday."

"C. But the servants of the Conservatoire want that day for rest. You will kill those poor people with fatigue."

"B. You are, no doubt, joking, sir. Those poor people you so much pity are delighted to earn a little money, and you will do wrong to prevent them."

"C. I won't consent, I won't consent, and I'll write to the Superintendent asking him to withdraw his leave.

"B. You are very good, sir, but M. de Larochefoucault will keep his word. I will write to him also, and narrate exactly the conversation I have had the honour to hold with you. He can then appreciate your reasons and mine."

So the two parted; and Berlioz wrote a letter to the Superintendent which made him laugh till the tears ran down his cheeks. In the result, our young man received a note from the official confirming permission to give the concert, and ending thus: "I charge you to show this letter to M. Cherubini, who has received the necessary orders in the matter." Away ran Berlioz to the Conservatoire without losing a moment, and handed the document to the Florentine. "Cherubini took the paper," he tells us, "read it attentively; re-read it, with a pale face; then turned green, and handed it back without a word."

The concert, thus troublous in preliminaries, was a sad experience for its giver. The services of Bloc as chef d'orchestre, and of Duprez and Dupont as vocalists, were obtained; but for soprano and bass Berlioz was obliged to be satisfied with two small people from the Opéra, without voice or talent. Then rehearsals and performance were alike indifferent, while the proceeds were no more than sufficient to pay bare expenses. And Miss Smithson all this time! What would poor Berlioz have felt had he known that the fair Irishwoman never heard a word said about him or his concert?

About this time Berlioz became acquainted with some of the symphonies of Beethoven, and his impressionable nature was once more stirred to the most extravagant demonstrations. He even, by sheer force of enthusiasm, persuaded his pedantic old master, Lesueur, to go and hear the "C minor" of the extraordinary German who had so recently passed away. After the performance, Berlioz met Lesueur in the lobby. He was very red, and taking long strides:—

"Well, dear master?" said I. "Ouf! I am going out; I want air. This is unheard of; marvellous! It has so moved and upset me, that in coming out of the box and essaying to put on my hat, I fancied I could not find my head. Let me alone now. Tomorrow!"

"On the morrow Lesueur was cooler, and did not care to talk about his experience. However, he said, 'One must not make music like that'; to which I answered, 'Be easy, dear master, one will not make much like it.'"

Berlioz now took what he calls the fatal step of becoming a musical critic on the staff of a new journal called La Quotidienne; and, in June, 1828, he gained the second prize for composition at the Institute. This was his third attempt, and his third failure, to reach the Grand Prix de Rome. Meanwhile his passion for Miss Smithson grew and overmastered him. Having no acquaintance with the young lady, he sent her letters, "which frightened rather than touched her," the result being that her servant was ordered to reject any more such amorous epistles. Then, as she was to perform at the Opéra-Comique for an artist's benefit, he offered to enrich the programme with a new overture, so that he might, at least, address her through his music:—

"The director and chef d'orchestre consented. When I went to the theatre, the English artists were rehearsing two scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet.' They were at the scene of the tomb. Just as I entered, Romeo, distracted, bore Juliet in his arms. My eyes fell involuntarily upon the Shakespearian group. I uttered a cry, and ran away wringing my hands. Juliet both saw and heard me—I made her afraid. Pointing me out, she asked the actors on the stage to take notice of the gentleman whose eyes boded no good."

The overture was rehearsed in turn, and Berlioz adds, "The executants applauded me, and I hoped something from the effect of the piece on the public and from the influence of my success upon Miss Smithson. Poor fool!" Poor fool, indeed! On the night of performance Miss Smithson did not even know that such an overture was to be performed, and, in a day or two, she left with her company for Holland. Berlioz, who resided—by chance, he tells us—opposite her lodging, saw her start, and describes his feelings in burning words:—

"It is difficult to picture suffering like that which I endured—that rending of the heart, that frightful isolation, that empty world; those thousand torments which circulated in the veins as with freezing blood; that distaste for living and that impossibility of dying. . . . I composed no longer; my intelligence appeared to diminish as much as my sensibility increased. I could do absolutely nothing—but suffer."

The months rolled on, and, a fourth time, Berlioz tried for the Prix de Rome, but again without success. His subject was "Cleopatra after the Battle of Actium," and the music, in its author's opinion, was worthy of the prize. "Consequently it did not succeed." On the morrow of the failure Berlioz met Boieldieu in the street, and the two had a conversation worth recording:—

"Boield. Good God, my boy, what have you done? You had the prize in your hand and have thrown it away.

"Berl. I did my best, sir, I declare.

"Boield. That's just what I complain of. You shouldn't do your best; it is the enemy of the good. How could I approve such things?—I, who love above all things music that soothes me.

"Berl. It is difficult, sir, to make soothing music when a Queen of Egypt, devoured by remorse, and poisoned by the bite of a serpent, dies in moral and physical anguish.

"Boield. Oh! you know how to defend yourself, I don't doubt, but that proves nothing. One can always be graceful.

"Berl. Yes, the old gladiators knew how to die with grace, but Cleopatra was not so clever; that was not her condition. Besides, she did not die in public.

"Boield. You exaggerate. We didn't ask you to make her sing a contredanse. But what necessity was there to use such extraordinary harmonies in your invocation of the Pharaohs? I, myself, am not a harmonist, and confess that I didn't understand one of your chords from the other world. And, then, why such an unheard-of rhythm in your accompaniment?

"Berl. I did not think, sir, it was necessary to avoid new forms in composition, when one has the happiness to find them, and they are in the right place.

"Boield. But, my dear fellow, Madame Debadie, who sang your cantata, is an excellent musician, and she had need of all her talent and attention.

"Berl. Ma foi! I didn't know, I confess, that music was intended to be performed without talent and without attention.

"Boield. Well, well, you will not be content to stop short. Profit by this lesson next year."

Ever enlarging his experience, Berlioz now made acquaintance with the "Faust" of Goethe through a French translation, and setting the lyrics to music, published them as "Huit Scènes de Faust." Subsequently the master collected and burned all the copies of this work on which he could lay hands. It was, however, under Goethe's influence that he composed, about the same time, his "Symphonie Fantastique"—taking three weeks to complete the Adagio, but writing the Marche au Supplice in a single night. Arrangements were made for the production of this piece at the Nouveautés, but at rehearsal so many chairs and desks were wanted for the big orchestra, that the managers backed out of the affair altogether. "Since then," says Berlioz, "I always look well to the matériel of my concerts. I know by experience that the least negligence in that respect may entail disaster." He next produced a dramatic fantasia, with chorus, on Shakespeare's "Tempest," and actually had it performed at the Italien. A real tempest, however, ruined the concert. The streets were flooded, and, counting every head in the theatre, not more than 300 persons heard the music. Some amend for these repeated disappointments was made when, in the following June (1830), the longed-for Grand Prix came to his hands. A cantata, having for subject "The Last Night of Sardanapalus," found favour with the judges, was duly performed, and brought to its author 3,000 francs yearly for five years, with the obligation to reside the first two years in Rome, and the third in Germany. Of course, the performance did not pass off without a hitch—none ever did when our master's music was in hand. Berlioz had arranged a grand effect for the explosion of Sardanapalus's palace, and upon this he counted much. In order to guard against mistakes he sat by the conductor's side, and Malibran, who could find no room in the hall, occupied a stool in the orchestra exactly facing him. The cantata went on, the King resolved to die, called his women around him, set fire to the palace, and all waited for the explosion.

"Five hundred thousand maledictions on musicians who don't count their bars. In my score, a horn gave the cue to the drums, the drums to the cymbals, these to the grosse-caisse, and the first blow on the grosse-caisse brought about the final explosion. My d—d horn missed his note, the drums not hearing it kept quiet; the cymbals and the grosse-caisse kept quiet also—nothing moved! nothing!! The violins and basses only continued their feeble tremolo, no explosion—a fire that went out without being lighted. . . . A cry of horror escaped from my panting breast; I flung my score across the orchestra; I upset two desks; Madame Malibran jumped back as though a mine had exploded under her feet. All was noise; the orchestra and academicians were scandalised; the audience mystified, and the composer's friends indignant. This was another musical catastrophe, and the worst I had experienced. If it had only been the last!"

The explosion was better managed at a second concert, conducted by Habeneck, at which the "Symphonie Fantastique" was also performed: Liszt, who had just then made the acquaintance of Berlioz, being among the most appreciative listeners. Of Liszt the master says: "I spoke to him of Goethe's 'Faust,' which he told me he had never read!" What sort of education, we wonder, did young Germans receive in those days, that a man like Liszt should be introduced to one of the masterpieces of his own literature by a Frenchman? The effect of Berlioz' music, and the discussions to which it gave rise, upon Cherubini was not agreeable to the old master. Said some one to him, as he passed the door of the concert-room while the public were entering, "Well, M. Cherubini, you are not coming to hear Berlioz' new work!" The answer was "I don't want to learn what not to do." Berlioz adds:—

"On the success of the concert he seemed like a cat that had swallowed mustard; he spoke no more, but sneezed. A few days later he sent for me and said, 'You are going to Italy?' 'Yes, sir!' 'Your name is to be taken off the books of the Conservatoire. Your studies are finished. But it seems to me that you ought to pay me a visit. No one leaves here as though he were a groom.' I was on the point of saying, 'Why not? since he is treated like a horse,' but I had the good sense to restrain myself, and even to assure our amiable director that I never thought of leaving Paris without paying a farewell visit and thanking him for his kindness."

Before going to Rome, Berlioz visited his parents at Côte St. André, both father and mother having been thoroughly reconciled to his profession by the success of his efforts to win the Grand Prix. At this time some correspondence passed between the master and Ferdinand Hiller relative to a lady to whom Berlioz had become attached through the fair one's wiles, Henrietta Smithson being still enshrined in his heart. This matter appears to have troubled him much, but need only be mentioned as continuing the wear and tear of mind and spirit from which Berlioz ought to have escaped in the retirement and repose of home.

In due time the young composer sailed from Marseilles for Italy, and after a stormy voyage and some passport troubles, incidental to a time of political tempest, arrived in Rome, taking up his abode, with the other French students, at Villa Medici, where Horace Vernet reigned as king. The next day he was introduced to the Café Greci, the headquarters of the student class; and on the morrow he made the acquaintance of Mendelssohn. Three weeks passed and no letters came from Paris, where Berlioz understood that some trouble was brewing. This so harassed him that he resolved upon going back to France, despite the friendly warnings of the director, Vernet. Before he could carry this resolution into effect, however, a letter came:—

"The packet they gave me contained an epistle of such extraordinary impudence, and so wounding to a man of my then age and experience, that it had a frightful effect upon me.* Tears of rage filled my eyes, and my course was instantly taken. It was to go to Paris and, without mercy, kill two guilty women and one innocent. After this, of course, I was bound to kill myself. The plan of the expedition was settled in a few minutes. In Paris they would fear my return, and recognise me. I resolved, therefore, to take precautions and disguise myself."

Without losing a moment the hare-brained young fellow engaged a friend to procure a passport and a vehicle, and ran himself to a shop where he bought the complete dress of a femme de chambre, which was to be his disguise. But even in this headlong haste and fury the instinct of the composer asserted itself. He had been rewriting the "Scène du Bal" of the "Symphonie Fantastique," and could not go on his journey to murder and suicide without leaving directions for the conclusion of the work. Accordingly he wrote on the manuscript:—

"I have no time to finish this: if the Society of Concerts at Paris should care to perform the piece in the absence of the author, I beg Habeneck to double on the octave below, with clarinets and horns, the passage for flutes at the last reappearance of the theme, and to write the chords that follow for full orchestra. That will do for a Coda." Having thus cared for his work, packed up his feminine dress, and armed himself with a pair of double-barrelled pistols, Berlioz started for Paris. Between Florence and Genoa he lost his disguise, and had some trouble in getting another made within six hours. Moreover the Sardinian police suspected him as a revolutionist, refused to endorse his passport for Turin, and ordered him to enter France by way of Nice. The reply to this was, "By way of Nice! what does that matter to me? I'll go by way of hell, if you like, so that I go somehow." Pursuing his route, Berlioz entertained himself with a mental rehearsal of the tragedy he was going to act:—

"I reach the house of my friends about nine o'clock in the evening, as they are taking tea. I am shown into the parlour as the femme de chambre of Madame la Comtesse M——, charged with an important message. I hand over a letter, and, as they are reading it, I take my two pistols from my bosom, I shoot one through the head, then another; then I seize the third by the hair, make myself known to her, and, despite her cries, I give her my third compliment. After that, before the concert of voices and instruments has attracted the curious, I launch at my right temple the fourth irresistible argument, and if the pistol should miss fire (I have provided for that) have recourse to my poison."

What a bloodthirsty young man to be sure! Antient Pistol was nothing to this wild-haired musician storming along the fair Mediterranean shore; save that he had a like regard for his own life. Berlioz, as he journeyed on, began to feel some doubts about the expediency of killing himself. He thought the necessity was "shameful," "Thus to say adieu to the world, to art; to leave no other reputation than that of a brute who did not know how to live; not to have finished my first symphony; to have others grander still in my head. Ah! 'tis"—Then the spirit of revenge would seize him and urge him on once more. On such an occasion the young man sprang up in his voiture and uttered a convulsive cry which made the driver jump aside, in the full belief that his passenger was "a devil obliged to carry about a piece of the true cross." The struggle between Berlioz' good and evil angels thus went on till, at last, the former induced him, in a moment of calmness, to commit his honour to a prudent course. When changing horses at a village, he hastily wrote a note to Horace Vernet, begging the director to keep his name on the list of students, and adding, "I bind myself upon my honour not to pass the frontiers of Italy till your answer comes to me at Nice, where I shall await it." This done, Berlioz returned to his carriage and discovered all at once that he was hungry. He had eaten nothing since leaving Florence. At Nice he received a friendly reply from Vernet. Nothing would be said about his escapade, and, getting rid of his feminine garments and his pistols, Berlioz breathed naturally again. The storm had blown over, and after it came a great calm. Reaction was complete. "I lived entirely alone. I wrote the overture to 'King Lear.' I sang. I believed in God. Convalescence!" Meanwhile the police kept their eyes upon him and, when they saw him familiar with officers of the garrison, summoned the suspected before them.

"P. What are you doing here, sir?"

"B. I am recovering from a cruel malady. I compose, I dream; I thank God for making such a bright sun, such a beautiful sea, and such verdant hills.

"P. You are not a painter?"

"B. No, sir.

"P. But you are seen everywhere with an album in your hand, and drawing a good deal. Are you engaged in collecting plans?"

"B. Yes, I 'collect' the plan of an overture to 'King Lear.' That is to say, I have 'collected' it, for the design and instrumentation are finished. I even think that the entrée of it will be formidable.

"P. What do you mean by the entrée? Who is this King Lear?"

"B. Alas, sir, a good old King of England.

"P. Of England?"

"B. Yes; he flourished, according to Shakespeare, about eighteen hundred years ago, and was weak enough to divide his kingdom between two wicked daughters, who showed him to the door when he had no more to give. You see there are so few kings—

"P. Don't speak of the king. What do you mean by that word instrumentation?"

"B. It's a musical term.

"P. Always that pretext. I know very well, sir, that people do not compose music without a piano, and only with an album and a pencil while walking stealthily along the shore. Therefore, if you will tell me where you are going, you shall have your passport. You cannot any longer stop here.

"B. Well, then, I will go to Rome, and still compose without a piano, with your permission."

So ended what Berlioz calls his "little comedy."

SACRED MUSIC IN ITALY.

THE death of Baron Ricasoli, the eminent Italian patriot and statesman, was signalled by a solemn funeral service at the church of Santa Croce in Florence, in the presence of an immense audience, which counted among its number notabilities from all parts of Italy. The Mass executed on the occasion was a Requiem in D minor by Commendatore Casamorata, the distinguished President of the Florence Academy of Music; and the choice was the more happy as Signor Casamorata's work is undoubtedly one of great merit, and offers a bright contrast to the feeble and hopeless attempts at sacred music with which the names of the Roman choir-masters of the day are associated.

The Requiem is essentially classical in form, though not without a certain dramatic element which at once mitigates the severity of style, and enhances the solemnity of the work. The Kyrie, Offertorio, and Benedictus—which latter was admirably sung by Signor Bichi, an excellent tenor—are very effective; the "Recordare Jesu Pie," and the "Oro Supplex," too, excel by beauty of expression and purity of style; but the palm belongs to the "Dies Iræ" and "Confutatis" which, by virtue of the noble and elevated tone pervading them, produced a profound impression. Concerted numbers and choruses predominate largely throughout the work, and the orchestral part is more or less descriptive, being marked by adequate colouring and, in some of the movements, by a very skilful treatment of the leading vocal subjects.

The managers of the ceremony had evidently taken pains to select a composition which should not only redound to the credit of a local musical institution, but also demonstrate to the numerous foreigners present that, after all, sacred music in Italy, or at least in Florence, is not quite in so hopeless a condition as is generally supposed. And, indeed, it is high time that something should be done in Italy to reform sacred music. With Signor Casamorata, Verdi and Bottesini are perhaps the only living Italian composers who have made an effort to infuse fresh vigour into the neglected Muse and save her from utter decay and ruin. Whatever may be said of the theatrical tendency of Verdi's Requiem, it is a luminous work, and an effort in the right direction. Bottesini's Requiem, although not so familiar, is undoubtedly the purer of the two. It was performed at the Teatro Regio of Turin during Holy Week last year, and deserves to be made known beyond the borders of Italy. But when we have spoken of Verdi, Bottesini, and Casamorata, we have said all, for the rest are, with one or two exceptions, such as Bazzini and Pedrotti, scarcely worthy of notice. This sweeping condemnation was painfully verified, not only by the compositions executed during Holy Week, 1880, in Rome, but by the Palestrina festival in May last. This so-called "festival," organised by Mustapha, the choirmaster of St. Peter's, consisted of two concerts of the same programme, of which Palestrina's compositions were really the only ones of any importance. The numerous works which had been sent, and had for the greater part been written for the occasion by Italian composers of the day, were hardly worth the paper on which they were printed.

This deplorable condition of sacred music in Italy is owing partly to the vis inertiae of the Church and the slovenliness of the services, partly to the indifference of the public to sacred music as such. The latter is but the natural consequence of the former, for of the modern Church of Rome, as a promoter of sacred music, it may with truth be said in the language of Rousseau: "Qui s'endort dans le sein d'un père n'est pas en souci du réveil." It is well known that the music performed in the churches of Rome is worse than inferior, and but for some occasional singer of note, such as the late Fra Giovanni, it would often be beyond endurance. It is characteristic that the only exception to this rule is the service at the German College, whose choir, being specially and admirably trained, is unique in its way. Organ performances, both in Rome and in provincial towns, have fallen to the level of galops, polkas, marches, or similar lively strains; and when they are executed by an organist who hammers and strums on an instrument which is either antiquated or out of tune, creaking and labouring at every note, the effect may be readily imagined. The only occasion on which something like a respectable performance of sacred music may now be heard in Rome is the anniversary of Victor Emanuel's death, when a funeral mass is executed at the Pantheon. It is only within the last few years that efforts have been made in Rome to perform Protestant oratorios, such as Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and "St. Paul," in concert-rooms; but it need hardly be added that it is an extremely difficult, if not thankless and impossible task to make such music popular in Rome or Italy. The success of performances of that kind depends on the uncertain support of the educated few and of foreign residents or visitors; to the mass of the people the slovenly singing and operatic tunes at St. Peter's, St. Giovanni in Laterano, or other churches are naturally much more attractive.

It is satisfactory to notice that quite recently some enlightened musicians in northern Italy have directed their attention to this disgraceful and intolerable state of things, and that under the presidency of Professor Guerrino Amelli, a Society, the "Santa Cecilia," has been founded at Milan with the object of promoting the reform of sacred music in Italy. The first concert lately given on St. Cecilia's day, under the auspices of the Society, appears not to have been very brilliantly supported, but the programme, being selected from strictly classical works of the best Italian and foreign masters, attested at once the aim of the promoters and their intention to attain it.*

The danger in a radical reform of this kind lies in rushing from one extreme to the other. There are not wanting those who advocate the views of Fétis and others, that the only style of music suitable for the Church, viz., sacred music in the strict sense of the term, is the Canto fermo, because it expresses that repose and immutability which are a fundamental principle of the Church of Rome. But to enforce Canto fermo in sacred compositions would be tantamount to denying to music the right of expressing feelings, passions, and affections, to impeding its progress and development, and to depriving it of all that constitutes, if not the beauty, certainly the essence and vitality of an art.

The principle of limiting sacred music to Canto fermo is therefore ipso facto absurd, and yet it has found acceptance with some, whilst others insist that the organ alone should be retained in the Church to the exclusion of all other instruments. Within the last two centuries music has made gigantic strides, and it would indeed be strange and inconceivable if in the temple "at whose altar," as Herder says, "music originated," if in the Church alone it were to be neglected or remain stationary. It is therefore only natural that sacred music should have the full benefit of the progress that has been made in music generally: to limit the means, to exclude this or that instrument, would only limit the power of expression.

Of course sacred music should not be operatic music, for its true object will always be to awaken in us the thought of the divine: indeed, it was in this sense that the Fathers of the Church, the Council of Trent, St. Bernard, and others, understood sacred music. But the mode of expressing religious feeling in music cannot be taught, and the degree of taste, refinement, and artistic education of the composer is the sole criterion: given those qualities, musical ideas may be enunciated in a thousand different forms.

Moreover, it would be impossible to draw a hard-and-fast line between sacred and secular music, and the truth of this is strikingly illustrated by the works of those composers who are universally accepted as masters in both branches of music. Many of the choruses of Mozart's Masses are in conception and treatment similar to the choruses of his operas; Handel's operatic airs are frequently reproduced in his oratorios, and vice versa; airs, such as Bach's "My heart, ever faithful," Mendelssohn's "Then shall the righteous," from "Elijah," &c., may be called strictly secular, so far as the music is concerned. Again, the airs of Pergolesi's "Olimpiade" do not differ materially from those of his "Stabat Mater"; parts of Cherubini's "Elisa al San Bernardo" are much more severe in style than the motett "Juste Die," and the "Gloria" of his Mass, not to speak of Rossini's, Gounod's, and Brahms's more modern works.

It is therefore to be hoped that the Santa Cecilia Society of Milan will not hamper its beneficial action by laying down narrow rules, or limiting the means of expression, and therefore the sphere of sacred music, which, as Schumann observes, should be after all the supreme aim of every composer. The Society should make it its object to diffuse a knowledge of the classical masters, to improve the taste for, and encourage the study and composition of, sacred music; and in this way it will alone be possible to gradually reform Italian Church Music, for the disgraceful and degenerate condition of which Rome is solely responsible.

THE benevolence which artists of all kinds show towards each other when help is needed lays them open to the wiles of chevaliers d'industrie in a special degree, and it would seem that just now musicians cannot be too careful how they entertain strangers. Three letters have reached our hands almost simultaneously, exposing as many cases of rank imposture. In the first instance we learn that, two years ago, Montreal was favoured with the presence of a gentleman who gave his name as Stephens. In a little while, however, he announced that he had taken this name to inherit some English property, his real cognomen being Verrinder—as a matter of fact, he was the Verrinder enrolled among the graduates of Oxford as a Doctor of Music. Our correspondent writes: "He is a man of good address, and of sufficient ability to warrant the belief that he could easily get along as Mr. Stephens without assuming a name belonging to another." At present, Mr. Stephens, alias Dr. Verrinder, is acting as an organist out in Western Canada, and we hope he will stay there. In the second instance, a correspondent at Brighton desires to know if Mr. Dudley Buck is in England, a plausible gentleman giving that name having called upon him and tried to borrow money, pending the receipt of a remittance from Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., whom he represented as his agents in this country. In the next case, a Portsmouth correspondent describes a visit paid to him by "Mr. Samuel P. Warren, Organist of Grace Church, New York" (probably the "Mr. Dudley Buck" of Brighton). Mr. Samuel C. Warren had to state that he was visiting the English cathedrals, and having brought an introduction to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., from Messrs. Ditson and Co., was permitted to use the name of that firm as a reference. Mr. Samuel P. Warren was so hospitably entertained by his brother organist at Portsmouth that, having lost his purse, he did not hesitate to go and pour the distressful story into his ears. The Englishman at once generously pressed the American to take £2 for immediate wants, and eventually succeeded in overcoming his scruples. A note soon after arrived stating that the purse had been found, and that the £2 would be returned the next morning; by which time, probably, Mr. Samuel P. Warren was in search of "fresh woods and pastures new." At any rate he was no more seen in Portsmouth. Transforming THE MUSICAL TIMES for the nonce into a Hue and Cry, we give a description of this ingenious practitioner: Medium height, brown hair, dark red moustache and beard, good teeth, grey tweed trousers and vest, grey flannel shirt, white cuffs, navy blue silk or satin scarf, black pilot coat trimmed with braid, fur-trimmed gloves, and low-crowned black felt hat. Should a personage answering this description call on any of our readers, they will do well to look after him with one eye while the other searches for a policeman.

Scribner's Magazine for March contains an interesting article on "Musical Possibilities in America," written by Mr. Theodore Thomas at the special request of the Editor. But for the great demand upon our space this month we should notice the article at length, and quote its more important passages. At present we can only indicate the purport of Mr. Thomas's observations. He starts by declaring that the Americans are a music-loving people, that their voices are good in quality though as yet undeveloped, and that they have of late shown a desire for serious purpose in music as in other arts. Improvement is more marked in connection with vocal than instrumental music, but Mr. Thomas has not much to say for the teaching of singing in the public schools. Large numbers of children learn by rote, while many more work on the "movable Do system," which he pronounces "fundamentally wrong" and a "make-shift invented by amateurs." He adds that school-singing in America is mostly screaming, such as one never hears in Germany or England; and characterises the musical standard of the country as "generally low." Mr. Thomas further points out that there are two centres of musical culture in his adopted country—the church and the theatre. In the church the music is an attraction and an amusement. "It is largely operatic, it appeals to the senses only, and is too often of the sickly sentimental order;" while in the theatre "we have now a blatant cornet or trombone, drums, bells, wood and straw instruments, every one making the greatest possible noise. . . . We had better music in the theatres twenty years ago than we have at present." With the centres in this condition, the circles around them are sorely out of order, and Mr. Thomas goes on to discuss the means of improvement. He would establish singing classes everywhere, so as to cultivate public taste and enlist public sympathy on behalf of the art. He would supplement this machinery by good musical instruction in the home and the school, and remove the elements of amateurism from teachers and other professors. "Those who present themselves to guide the people must have thoroughly studied music, not dabbled in it." Finally he would have good music colleges so well endowed as to be independent of a mere commercial policy. This is the gist of Mr. Thomas's paper—one likely to do much good in America because, speaking with mingled authority and kindness, it exposes faults. Our cousins evidently lack a good deal of that which constitutes musical health, but they are a young people, and, to quote Mr. Thomas's wise words, "as the country advances in age and begins to acquire some of the repose which age brings there will come possibilities of development which cannot now be estimated."

UNDER the heading "A Musical Mission," an interesting article appeared recently in a morning contemporary, graphically describing a visit on a cold, bleak night to a front kitchen in a house at Islington where some forty children were assembled for an evening of singing. "Little maids of all work, nurses, general servants, the oldest veteran among them sixteen, and about four feet high" composed this cheerful group, under temporary shelter, at least, whilst the wind was howling piteously and the snow falling outside. "They had bright, pale, intelligent faces," it is said, "for the most part; many of them looked delicate, but they had not the dull look of workhouse children." A lady missionary started the music, and voice after voice joined in, the sorrowful forgetting their sorrows for the time, and the happy—if any could be called so—more joyful for the sound of sympathetic voices around. The songs they like best are gay and simple tunes. "One song they came to in the book," said the missionary, "was never sung again, for it set half the class crying. It was the story of a drunken father. 'Please 'm, Mary Anne's father, he leathers her,' says a poor little soprano. 'And Fanny's too,' says another; and then they all began to cry." They catch up all the tunes very quickly; and in passing through the district the children's voices are often heard singing the songs they have learnt at this humble school. Of late the benevolent lady who superintends this class has engaged a bandmaster for them twice a week, and she says that it has answered admirably. The narrator of this pathetic story says that "any who can pipe can come to the help of these patient, grateful little mortals, who are ready to dance, even though their hearts are heavy and their feet in rags." When we add that £300 would buy the room now wanted, a larger school-room, and a night refuge, it is earnestly to be hoped that all who can proffer monetary as well as artistic aid will do something to help those generous and kind-hearted individuals who are labouring both night and day in so noble a cause.

THE lively contributor to our Gallic contemporary Le Figaro, who signs himself "Ignotus," has recently entertained its readers with a gossip about M. Gounod, his character, genius, and works. Amongst many other agreeable and flattering things, he says that the distinguished French composer is now in fuller possession of his means than at any previous time. "To-day," observes "Ignotus," "the artist who calls himself M. Gounod is neither tired nor idle. He has become more and more qualified for work. He has profited by the varied sufferings of the past." Referring to the "Tribut de Zamora," which has so long been in rehearsal at the Opéra, "Ignotus" points out that this is not M. Gounod's latest work, the character being sustained by "a sacred trilogy intended for production at the great London Festival of 1882." "Ignotus," of course, means the Birmingham Festival of 1882, but we must not expect accuracy in matters English from a French writer. The contributor adds "This work is entitled 'Redemption.' The last part is Calvary. M. Gounod sang some portions to us with his broken yet beautiful and penetrating voice. The work appears to me as—grandiose idea—a sort of March for the 'Way of the Cross.'" So much interest attaches to the forthcoming oratorio of the gifted Frenchman that even this scrap of testimony concerning its worth is very welcome, and will stimulate expectation. "Ignotus," after saying that we may not look for the creator of a tenth symphony, adds, "But our age has a character of its own, and I hope that a great artist will create an original work bearing its stamp. It will be the music of our grand névrose"—this medical term being used to express the extreme sensitiveness characteristic of modern life. "Such a musician is impatiently awaited by instruments, voices, and souls. Master, he is, perhaps, yourself!" Perhaps; but it suffices to hope that the "Redemption" will rise to the height of its great argument.

It may indeed be accepted as a bright and cheering sign of the progress of music in this country when we find its intimate and deep connection with the other arts acknowledged and eloquently enlarged upon by the President of the Royal Academy. On some former occasions Sir Frederick Leighton has taken care that, in a representative assembly of literature and art, music shall not be left out in the cold; but his thorough appreciation of its true mission in the world was more decisively shown at the recent dinner of the Royal Society of Musicians when, in response to the toast, "The Sister Arts," he boldly proclaimed his belief that music, of all appeals to the inmost nature of man, was the most forcible, because the least trammelled. When a number of speeches are made at an ordinary public dinner we may readily forgive reporters for chiefly directing their attention to those delivered by royal or political orators; but an artistic address at an artistic gathering may surely claim recognition; and it is surprising therefore that, in most of the newspaper accounts of the meeting in question, the record of Sir Frederick Leighton's part in the proceedings should have been confined to the fact of his having spoken. Trusting to our memory, however, we recall with pleasure his assertion that art, being a common language, swept aside those barriers created by speech and race; and to show the affinity between painting and music, that such terms as form, breadth, tone, and style were used alike by artists in colour and sound. The great significance of such a speech cannot be overrated; for a frank avowal of the deepest sympathy with one art becomes doubly powerful when it emanates from a master so accomplished and eminent in another.

THE howlings of the band of fanatics known as the "Salvation Army" prove that music has its abuses as well as its uses. A short time since we recorded our encounter with a small detachment from the main body of these valiant champions in the cause of what they foolishly imagine to be religion; and we now find that they are spreading themselves over the country, many of the leaders assuming nicknames, reminding us of the time of "Praise-God-Barebones," when sacred and profane prefixes of this kind were rather the rule than the exception with those who enlisted under the so-called "holy" banner. But as music is presumed to be the animating spirit inciting these warriors to battle with the sinfulness existing around them, words which have been intensified by the genius of composers are usually chosen for the purpose of identification; and we hear, therefore, of a "Hallelujah Sweep," a "Hallelujah Butler," a "Hallelujah Footman," and a "Praising Page," all of whom are said to be performing prodigies of valour. We could add many other musical names to this list did we not feel that we are gratuitously advertising those who bring discredit upon the sacred calling they profess. The Christian Herald (an accredited organ of the fanatical party), after recounting the fearful story of a poor engine-driver who, in attending to his duties before the furnace during the progress of a train, became enveloped in flames, from the effects of which he expired in agony, says, "Is not this an illustration of the way in which destruction shall overtake the wicked? Suddenly shall it come upon them, and they shall not escape." Is this the kind of "Christianity" that would be preached by the "Hallelujah Sweep"?

WHEN, some years ago, it was proposed that criminal prisoners should be treated with more leniency, and that gaols should undergo periodical supervision as to their sanitary state, Sidney Smith expressed his fear that persons might break into prisons, in the hope of getting a more comfortable home than they could procure outside. This good-humoured piece of satire was of course before the time when our laws began to acknowledge the possibility of reforming those who had gone astray, and before the days of "ragged schools" and other institutions calculated to better the condition of the lower classes. Latterly we have drawn attention to the good work now going on around us; but the following paragraph, which appeared recently in an American paper, shows that in the United States an example has been set which, as far as we know, has not yet been followed in this country: "Miss Henrietta Markstein gave a concert for the entertainment of the convicts at Blackwell's Island, New York, a few evenings ago." We do not know the name of Miss Markstein here; but it is evident that she has faith in the powers of music even upon those who have proved themselves deaf to the moral teachings of the world against which they have sinned. "Music is well said to be the speech of angels," wrote the late Thomas Carlyle. Who knows but that the very persons who refuse to listen to the speech of men may be moved by the eloquence of a language to which they were before strangers? Be the effect, however, what it may, all honour to the artist who has sufficiently braved public opinion to make the experiment.

No doubt the reason for not invariably observing the advice conveyed in the old adage, "enough is as good as a feast," is the difficulty of knowing precisely when we have had enough. But it must be remembered that when seated at a musical feast we cannot accept or refuse the various items in the menu offered to us, but must take them all or leave the room. Knowing this, concert-givers should be merciful; and we cannot help therefore calling attention to the programme of a performance which appears to us a curiosity. At first we thought it was a music-publisher's catalogue, but, on closely examining it, we found that it was actually the programme of a concert with an extensive list of artists, the degree of efficiency or of reputation of whom is indicated by the size of the type in which the names are printed. The concert is divided into three parts, and fifty pieces are to be performed. Amongst these are choral compositions—one a "Chorus of Spring Birds, with trills for all the voices"—songs, and pianoforte solos and duets, the concert-giver being largely represented as a composer. This is indeed a formidable programme; but a ray of sunshine illumines the first page, for there it is announced that there will be "no encores."

We had occasion last month to point out the inconsiderate way in which concert-givers sometimes claim the credit of being first with musical novelties. In their haste to pose before the public as enterprising and adventurous discoverers, they have no patience to look closely after possible traces of earlier explorers, and the result sometimes is that they appear ridiculous. The Bach Choir, for example, stated in the programme of its last concert that Schumann's "Requiem for Mignon" was then to be performed "for the first time in England." This statement having been repeated in the Standard, elicited a note from a correspondent asserting that the "Requiem" was given in April, 1878, by the Newcastle Amateur Vocal Society, under Mr. W. Rea. It was only fair that this should appear, and we are very greatly mistaken if the work in question was not performed also in St. James's Hall two or three years since, at a concert given by, if we remember rightly, Mr. Welch. Anyhow, these repeated exposures should teach caution and the advisability of research before making announcements likely to do injustice to others.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE most important feature at the Crystal Palace Concerts during last month has been the continuation and (on Saturday last) the completion of the chronological performance of Schubert's Symphonies. By a curious coincidence these symphonies, like those of Beethoven, are nine in number; the ninth and last being infinitely the finest in the case of both composers. But here the resemblance ends. The symphonies of Beethoven include the most perfect fruits of his genius from its early budding to its fullest maturity, those of the younger composer, with the exception of the two last, belong to his early years, when Schubert was not yet Schubert. The absolute value of the earlier works is therefore not very great, but their consecutive performance was nevertheless well warranted. For here the thoughtful listener was able to watch the gradual development of a great power, till at last the acme was reached in the great C major symphony, perhaps, of all the symphonic works produced since Beethoven, the one most worthy of being classed with the immortal nine of that master. Considering that even this wonderful piece was written at an age when most composers are still in their "first style," one felt the truth of what Grillparzer, the poet, inscribed on Schubert's tombstone, that the promise of his life was richer even than its achievement. To Mr. Grove who, of living men, has done most in rescuing Schubert's works from oblivion, thanks are due for the idea of performing the symphonies consecutively, and to Mr. Manns for the admirable way in which that idea has been carried out.

The rendering of the C major, on Saturday last, to quote but one instance, was a marvel of refinement and spirit, and fully deserved the prolonged and unanimous applause awarded to the excellent conductor.

The novelties produced at these Concerts during the past month have not been of very great importance, especially as regards importations from abroad. The first in order, although scarcely in merit, was a symphonic poem "Vlatava" (the Czech name of the River Moldau), by Mr. Smatana, a composer of Bohemian origin, and the author of several operas and other works. The music is pleasant, but not very original, and the instrumentation noisy. The fashion is becoming too common of giving a high-sounding title to intrinsically trivial music, and thus fitting it for the concert-room, a custom which the conductors of serious performances should not encourage. The same remark is suggested by another novelty, this time of Italian origin, which was produced at the Concert of the 12th ult., the symphonic poem "Leonora," by Signor Bandini, founded on the same ballad of Bürger which inspired Raff's beautiful work of that name. According to the programme, Signor Bandini's work received the prize out of seventy-eight compositions in Turin last year; and it is at any rate satisfactory to learn that there are in Italy seventy-eight writers—mostly young men, we should surmise—occupied in producing, or at least attempting to produce, serious instrumental music. Of the quality of that music no very high idea, however, can be formed from the best work out of so large a number, provided the judgment was fairly given. Signor Bandini is still in his teens, and has produced a piece of music full of crudities and imperfections, but creditable in one so young. If he had been satisfied with this success, and modestly called his work a concert-overture or fantasia, he might have claimed a lenient judgment; but by describing it as a poema sinfonico illustrative of Bürger's poem, with which it has nothing whatever in common, he makes himself liable to the charge of pretentiousness in addition to that of incompetence.

By the side of these two foreigners, two English musicians, who have contributed novelties to the Crystal Palace programmes, appear to decided advantage. Mr. H. Gadsby's Cantata for tenor solo, male chorus, and orchestra, although not a work of genius, is by no means without merit. The libretto, by Mr. Grist, is founded on a highly dramatic incident of Columbus's voyage and discovery, and opportunities for effective vocal writing are by no means wanting. Of these opportunities Mr. Gadsby has availed himself to good purpose. The tenor solo (admirably declaimed by Mr. Lloyd) is well written for the voice, and equally effective are some of the choral pieces, more especially a sailor's drinking song ("Ere the sun with visage red"), and the ensemble, in which the crew express their renewed confidence in the great captain whom shortly before they were on the point of throwing into the sea. Mr. Gadsby's Cantata was a decided success, and may be cordially commended to choral societies of even moderate accomplishments. The only difficulties of execution are in the solo part.

Another work by an English, or at least Scotch, composer was the chief novelty of last Saturday's concert. Mr. Mackenzie, differing in this from Mr. Gadsby, is evidently a disciple of the modern school. His Scottish Rhapsody (Op. 24), surnamed "Burns," belongs to the class of music called into life by Liszt's "Rhapsodies Hongroises," and the Hungarian master has spoken in very favourable terms of the work of his young admirer. The three parts of Mr. Mackenzie's work, Molto maestoso, Andante dolente, and Vivace, have each a separate motto selected from Burns's works; and the inspiration drawn from this source is evident no less in the chief melodies than in their orchestral and harmonic treatment. Mr. Mackenzie has, in a marked degree, what is generally called orchestral "colour"; and his work, besides being intensely Scotch, is absolutely speaking a praiseworthy piece of music, the Andante especially being full of charming sentiment. At the same concert Herr von Zur Mühlen, a Russian tenor, supplied an admirable rendering of "Tyranic love" in a German disguise, and Miss Mary Davies gave Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhäuser," and two songs, by Sterndale Bennett, with that purity of intonation and sweet simplicity of feeling peculiarly her own. Madame Montigny-Rémaury played Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor in a highly finished style, to which she added a short Allegro for pianoforte and orchestra, by M. B. Godard, not very refined in character, although effective for the solo instrument. The remaining soloists worthy of notice during the month have been Herr Joachim (Beethoven's Concerto), on the 5th ult., and Herr Barth and Madame Patey on the 12th ult. Mr. Lloyd's excellent performance in "Columbus" has already been referred to.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE more than usually crowded appearance presented by St. James's Hall on February 28 was sufficiently accounted for by the reappearance on this occasion of that unique and truly great artist, Madame Schumann. The reception accorded to the lady, on the part of the audience, was genuine and enthusiastic in proportion as her absence during three preceding seasons had been a matter of extreme regret to amateurs in this country, and especially to the frequenters of this institution. Among the several able pianists of a younger generation, who during this interval have become more or less established favourites at these Concerts, none may be said to have taken the place of the absentee. The reason for this we have already indicated. Madame Schumann's playing is unique, her every performance is an inspiration. With rare technical acquirements she combines the qualities of a true poet; and while her whole being appears to be absorbed in the ideas of the composer whose work she is interpreting, she, to a degree unequalled by any other living pianist, may be said to create anew while she interprets. Such qualities are likely to gain in depth and intensity with the advance of time, and that such is the case with Madame Schumann her present visit to this country has again proved. The lady, on the occasion referred to, gave an absolutely perfect rendering of her late husband's "Etudes Symphoniques," the well-known series of brilliant and interesting variations on a comparatively uninteresting theme, and was, of course, rapturously encored, when she substituted another piece. The same artist's association later in the evening with Herr Joachim, in the interpretation of Brahms's latest Sonata (Op. 78), for pianoforte and violin, assured every possible advantage to a work which, though unequal in its merits, is not unworthy of the somewhat exaggerated reputation of its author. We have spoken of the Sonata in question at some length on a previous occasion, this having been its third performance here. The Concert opened with a fine rendering of Mendelssohn's String Quartet in E minor (Op. 44, No. 2), and concluded with Haydn's Quartet in D minor (Op. 76, No. 2), the executants being MM. Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. Mr. Oswald contributed the vocal portions of the programme, viz., Smart's song "Estelle," and Buononcini's air "Love leads to battle." We have heard the young artist to better advantage before.

The first Concert of the past month opened with Mozart's String Quartet in C major (No. 6), the last of the set dedicated to Haydn, and an old-established favourite at these Concerts, as, indeed, with amateurs generally the quartet party being the same as on the previous Monday. Herr Barth was the pianist on this occasion, and played, in his admirable manner, Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in G major (Op. 29), and, in conjunction with MM. Joachim and Piatti, Schumann's Trio in F major (Op. 80), a work scarcely inferior in artistic merit to the earlier trio by the same composer (Op. 63) although less frequently heard. Herr Joachim's playing of four of Brahms's Hungarian Dances provoked, as usual, enthusiastic plaudits. Madame Isabel Fasset, a genuine contralto of a very sympathetic timbre, sang with much effect songs by Scarlatti and Taubert.

Madame Schumann was again the pianist on the following Monday (the 14th ult.), her only performance on this occasion being a rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in A major (Op. 101), which, we imagine, few of those present will easily forget. The consummate skill with which the artist surmounted the abnormal technical difficulties which abound in the work were entirely lost sight of in the grand general realisation of the composer's conception, a result which can only be achieved by that poetic insight and depth of feeling which characterise the present interpreter in such a marked degree. After this splendid effort of the artist an encore, objectionable at all times, appeared peculiarly out of place. The audience, however, as usual, insisted upon it, and was gratified by the lady's fine rendering of Schumann's "Traumeswirren." Herr Joachim, who never plays more con amore than when he has Spohr to deal with, gave in his best style the Recitative and Adagio from that composer's Sixth Violin Concerto in G minor. No composer ever knew better how to write for an instrument of which he was himself such a consummate virtuoso. Schubert's beautiful Quintet in C major (Op. 163) was capitally rendered by MM. Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, Pezze, and Piatti; as was Haydn's Quartet in C major (Op. 33, No. 3), on the part of the usual quartet party, which concluded the programme. The vocal solos of the evening—songs by Mendelssohn and A. Thomas—were most pleasingly and artistically rendered by Miss Santley, whose fresh and brilliant soprano voice will, doubtless, be guarded against the dangers of a premature straining by her father.

The Concert of the 21st ult. included the first performance at this institution of a Quartet in G minor by Robert Volkmann, a composer of Hungarian birth, chiefly known in this country by some of his orchestral compositions. The quartet under notice, one of six from the same pen, is a fair specimen of the composer's powers in the domain of chamber-music, being throughout well written in thorough musicianlike style, while the opening and the concluding movements contain much that is truly original and indicative of a talent of no mean order. We doubt not that the quartet in question would gain on a second hearing. MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, and Hausmann were the executants. Madame Schumann played, in conjunction with the artists just named, Robert Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet in E flat, her solo performance on this occasion being Bach's Prelude in B minor, and Prelude and Fugue in E minor, in the rendering of which the lady produced the usual marked effect. Mendelssohn's (posthumous) Andante and Scherzo, played by MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, and Hausmann, concluded the proceedings of the evening. A very favourable impression was produced by the début of Herr von Zur Mühlen, who was the vocalist, and gave an expressive interpretation of songs by Schubert, and Robert and Clara Schumann. M. Zerbini officiated as Conductor on each occasion.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

SINCE we last noticed the doings of this Society, two Concerts have been given, one on the 4th ult., when Sir M. Costa's "Naaman" was performed with the success which usually attends that work as executed under its composer's careful and zealous direction. There is little to say about the occurrences of the evening beyond such words as are necessary to do justice to the efforts of all concerned. The soloists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Robertson, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley, by whom the various characters were most effectively sustained. Mrs. Osgood won much favour in the scene of Elisha's greatest miracle; Miss Robertson sang the music of the captive maid with charming freshness and naïveté; Mr. Vernon Rigby, as Naaman, was in his best form; and Mr. Santley, the original representative of Elisha at Birmingham in 1864, did his work with all the artistic finish for which he is so justly celebrated. The chief honours fell, however, to Madame Patey, whose delivery of "I dreamt I was in heaven" excited the warmest admiration and a perfectly irresistible encore. Sir Michael Costa had no reason for dissatisfaction with the hearing given to his work. Several numbers were repeated, and applause was frequent throughout the evening.

The second Concert to which we have referred took place on Friday last, when a varied programme was presented—more varied than those who made the original plan dreamed of when discharging their functions. They could not have known that an Emperor would be assassinated before the date of the performance, but, on learning that the sad event had taken place, arrangements were at once made to initiate the proceedings with the Dead March in "Saul." The propriety of this course seemed to be obvious, for, as the solemn strains began, all present rose and remained standing to the end. By a singular coincidence the next piece was Handel's Coronation Anthem, "The King shall rejoice," which masterly example of the great Saxon's Church music received every justice from the band and chorus. It was keenly enjoyed by many who would know more of Handel than a few of his oratorios, but whose opportunities of gratifying their desire are rare. Cherubini's Requiem, in C minor, followed, and made its customary impressive effect. By no means as elaborate as the Requiem, in D minor, produced by the Bach Society last year, this work is perhaps more adapted for public performance on that very account. At any rate, it comes easily within ordinary comprehension without stooping from a place of highest dignity, while it is not so long as to prove a trial to average patience. The Mass was heard on Friday with great attention, and much enjoyed, thanks to an impressive rendering as well as to its own merits. Mendelssohn's music to "Athalie" brought the concert to an end; the illustrative verses being recited by Mr. Charles Fry, and the solos taken by Miss C. Penna, Miss Jessie Jones, and Miss Orridge. We must commend the general performance as quite worthy the Society's reputation. The overture was admirably given, the chorus was rarely at fault, and the soloists knew their work well. On his part Mr. Fry left nothing to desire. He delivered the verses—poor ones they are—with intelligence and point; his declamation per se was of a high order, and he showed a rare degree of skill in those passages which Mendelssohn has accompanied by music. Mr. Fry's effort was, in point of fact, a distinct success. Sir M. Costa conducted as usual.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE first Concert of the season, on February 24, contained two novelties, a MS. Pianoforte Concerto by Scharwenka, and Berlioz' overture to "Waverley" (Op. 1). The labour apparent in Herr Scharwenka's Concerto, both in the pianoforte part and the orchestral writing, induced a sense of weariness in the auditors which not even the clever playing of the composer could lessen; and the result was that, in spite of the warm applause which followed each movement, the relief at the conclusion of the work was tacitly indicated throughout the room. The "Adagio" has certainly some effective, if not very original, phrases; and the last movement is at least less dull than the first; but the want of spontaneous thought throughout the Concerto makes us wonder why so clever an executant should manufacture passages for the display of his powers instead of exhibiting them legitimately in the many standard compositions lying ready to his hand. Berlioz' Overture is no doubt suggested by Scott's novel, but any other title would fit it as well. As abstract music it merits a word of praise, if only as shadowing forth the composer's early command of orchestral resources; but the themes are not particularly winning. The programme of this Concert also contained Beethoven's fourth Symphony, and the Overtures "Melusina" and "Guillaume Tell," the execution of which showed a decided improvement in the band, although in delicacy and finish much is still wanting. The vocalists were Mdle. Friedländer (who chose a song inappropriate to the occasion from Bach's "Passion" music), Madame Enriquez, and Mdle. Orgeni.

At the second Concert, on the 10th ult, the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony of Berlioz formed the principal item in the programme, and attracted a large and critical audience. Were the resuscitation of Berlioz' compositions due to the efforts of the Philharmonic Society it would be entitled to the thanks of all music-lovers—for assuredly the next best thing to the production of new works of merit is the revival of old ones—but as public attention has been awakened to the claims of this much-neglected composer for some time before the Society, could be roused into action, we can only award praise for discreetly following the fashion. It is good, however, that this Symphony should have been chosen for the occasion, as we believe that in its entirety it had never before been heard in this country. A verdict pronounced off-hand upon a work of such magnitude would be absurd; but a record of general impressions may be allowed even when such a summing-up can scarcely on the whole be considered favourable. Berlioz was essentially a student of the orchestra, and to this idea all others were subservient. When he desires to express himself with all the eloquence of his art he speaks through his instruments, and "Romeo and Juliet" therefore—the most passionate, perhaps, of all his works—he truly calls a "Symphony," the vocal parts indeed being so feeble in comparison with those exclusively written for the orchestra as to make us wish that he had dispensed with voices altogether. It may certainly be a question whether it is within the province of music to describe, in the form of a Symphony, such a play as "Romeo and Juliet"; but it must be remembered that many of the modern German composers, who are held up as worthy successors of Beethoven, have done the same thing, and, in our opinion, with effects infinitely more disastrous to the foundations of art-structure than can be produced by any of the compositions of Berlioz. There can scarcely be a doubt that, as "programme music," the "Love Scene" is by far the best movement in the Symphony under notice, for here, at least, there is no straining after effect; melody, exquisitely coloured by the most delicate instrumentation, seems to have sprung up in the mind of the composer as spontaneously as did the passionate words of the lovers in the mind of Shakespeare; and so charming are the phrases, and so vividly is the scene represented, that even the sternest critic must be content simply to listen and admire. But the movement representing "Romeo alone," with the music indicating the feast at Capulet's house, although full of imagination, and in many places instinct with dramatic feeling, cannot but impress the hearer with a sense of the composer having been somewhat overweighted by his self-imposed task. In the "Queen Mab" Scherzo, however, we have an exquisitely light and fanciful piece, the remarkable instrumentation in which—notwithstanding our recent acquaintance with the Wagnerian effects—seems as novel as it is beautiful. This movement was loudly applauded, and indeed appeared to be more popular than any other purely instrumental piece in the work. The orchestral number descriptive of "Romeo at the tomb of the Capulets" is short, and remarkable for a passing reminiscence of the "love" theme, which is treated with much skill and effect. Of the vocal portions of the work we cannot speak in high praise; for, with the exception of the Scherzetto "Queen Mab," for Mercutio, and the Chorus "Oh! strew the flowers," in the piece descriptive of "Juliet's funeral," the voices appear scarcely to fit in with the artistic design of the work. The contralto solo in the "Prologue" is laboured and ineffective; the choral portions both in the "Prologue" and the "Finale," although beautiful and thoroughly dramatic in parts, are scarcely equal in writing to the instrumental numbers; and the music for Friar Laurence—especially the "Oath of Reconciliation" at the end—is rather heavy than impressive. As we have already said, these remarks must be accepted only for what they are worth on a single hearing of a work the complex nature of which taxes the listener to the utmost; but as the Symphony is announced to be repeated at the fourth concert, we shall in our next number claim the privilege of confirming or modifying our first impressions. Of the performance of the composition we must speak in the highest terms, and warmly congratulate Mr. Cusins, the Conductor, upon a success much of which was unquestionably due to his exertions. The orchestra, consisting of 100 performers, was excellent, especially in the string department; and the Upper Choir of the South London Choral Association (under the direction of Mr. Leonard C. Venables), although somewhat wanting in power, sang as if they had thoroughly studied the music. The principal vocalists—Madame Patey, Mr. Boyle, and Mr. F. King—were most efficient in the trying solo music, Mr. Boyle eliciting an encore for the Queen Mab song, which, although complimentary to the singer, completely marred the effect of continuity in the Prologue. Mr. Cusins was called forward at the conclusion of the work, and greeted with well-deserved applause. Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus" was played before Berlioz' Symphony; and in the second part Mr. Eugene D'Albert gave a brilliant rendering of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A, the Concert concluding with Weber's Overture to "Der Freischütz."

At the third Concert, on the 24th ult., Spohr's Symphony "Die Weihe der Töne" (which is still translated "The Power of Sound") and Beethoven's Violin Concerto—finely played by Herr Joachim—were the principal attractions; but the charmingly descriptive Fantasia-Overture "Paradise and the Peri" (Sterndale Bennett), Spontini's Overture "La Vestale," and an Overture by Svendsen, "Sigurd Slembe," were also included in the programme. The last-named work is termed by the composer a "Symphonic Introduction" to Björnson's drama; and certainly, as it is neither an overture nor a symphony, this title will do as well as any other. It is assuredly a composition of high merit, the instrumentation especially being masterly throughout, and several of the motives having an interest quite apart from their value as illustrative of the varied incidents of the drama. Many of the points are extremely effective, and there is, on the whole, more continuity of thought than we generally find in the modern "programme music." Mr. Sims Reeves was unfortunately prevented by indisposition from appearing; but his place was supplied by Mr. Frank Boyle, whose songs were accompanied on the piano-forte by Mr. C. E. Stephens. The other vocalist was Mdlle. Orgeni. At all the concerts under notice Mr. W. G. Cusins conducted.

MR. HALLÉ'S CONCERTS.

HAVING produced the "Damnation de Faust" of Berlioz with so much success in London, it was natural and right that Mr. C. Hallé should follow on with the same master's "L'Enfance du Christ"—a work of a very different character, as may be supposed, but equally representative of a peculiar genius. "L'Enfance du Christ," as a whole, is one of Berlioz' later productions, but it seems to have been written at various times. Thus the part known as the "Flight into Egypt" was composed long before any other, and actually produced as the work of a composer of the last century; Berlioz thus seeking to reveal the ignorance of his critics, who fell into the trap, and actually lauded the supposititious author at the expense of the real one. The "sacred trilogy" is, as the term implies, divided into three parts, subdivided into scenes. First, we have "Herod's Dream" leading up to the Massacre of the Innocents; next, the Flight into Egypt, with various connected incidents; and, lastly, the experiences of the Holy Family "within the city of Saïs," where, after repeated disappointments, they take up their abode with a hospitable carpenter. A close examination of the story and the music which Berlioz has allied to it demands more space than can here be given. We must, however, bear our testimony to the skill with which Berlioz—who was his own librettist—laid out his subject. Herod's dream is, no doubt, in strong contrast with all that follows, but the effect secured heightens rather than lowers the sense of gratification imparted by the entire work. We pass through the gloomy, spectre-haunted chambers of the king's palace to the idyllic innocence of the Bethlehem stable, and enjoy the change all the more because it is so great. In this respect the end completely justifies the means. With regard to the music, much might be said of an interesting kind. But it will suffice to point out the remarkable manner in which Berlioz, who so often wrote in the "Ercles' vein," here accommodates himself to the demands of simplicity and gentle, unaffected pathos. So far, "L'Enfance du Christ" is a study and a revelation, that part of it especially which he passed off as eighteenth century work. It shows with surprising clearness what a poet this master was, and how he could accommodate himself to demands that, at first sight, seemed beyond his range altogether. "L'Enfance du Christ" will certainly be heard in London again and again. Meanwhile amateurs cannot do better than study it for themselves with the full assurance that it deserves their complete attention.

The performance, though marred by the difficulty of singing "behind the scenes," passed off in a manner on the whole deserving of praise. Miss Santley, daughter of our eminent baritone, sang the music of the Virgin Mother with very nice feeling and taste; Mr. Lloyd, as the Narrator, gave some charming numbers with exquisite effect; Signor Foli was impressive as Herod and the good Carpenter of Saïs; and Mr. Santley brought all his artistic powers to the modest rôle of Joseph. The orchestra was excellent throughout, while only the word excellent fitly describes the manner in which Mr. Hallé conducted the entire performance.

LAMOUREUX CONCERTS.

EMULOUS, as it would seem, of Herr Richter, who came, saw, and conquered in London with such ease, M. Lamoureux, some time Conductor of the Grand Opéra, Paris, paid us a visit last month, and gave two orchestral concerts in St. James's Hall. M. Lamoureux's object we may suppose to be twofold. It was personal and, also, patriotic—personal, in that he wished to demonstrate his own skill as a chef d'orchestre, patriotic in that he desired to assert the musical claims of France as represented by her living composers. There was no need for M. Lamoureux to bespeak a welcome beforehand. All men of eminence are received in London with open arms, and given the fairest field on which to show what they can do. The French Conductor spared neither pains nor expense in view of his purpose. He engaged an orchestra more than a hundred strong, headed by M. Sainton, and including a large number of our best instrumentalists, and he made arrangements for as many rehearsals as were necessary to familiarise the performers with their strange chief and equally strange music. Thus equipped for action, and strong in an assurance that at least the artistic results of the enterprise would be satisfactory, M. Lamoureux came before the English public.

The first Concert took place on the 15th ult., and was attended by a crowd of connoisseurs and professors eager for new experiences. Of these they had plenty, the programme abounding in novelty. The overture to "Le Carnaval Romain" (Berlioz) led off, with abundant proof of the merit of the orchestra and M. Lamoureux's remarkable aptitude as a Conductor. This was followed by Théodore Gouvy's Symphony in F, second of the five—some authorities say six—which that accomplished musician has produced. M. Gouvy has, hitherto, been unfortunate in England. That is to say, he has been totally neglected, while other French composers with not so much genius, but more inclination to swim with the tide, have attracted notice. After experience of his Symphony in F, we should know him better. It is not a work on the largest and grandest scale, but every movement shows great talent, charming ideas, and appropriate as well as skilful expression. This is especially the case with the first Allegro—a movement of which any composer might be proud. That the Symphony came as a surprise was very evident, and that it excited a desire to improve M. Gouvy's acquaintance was a logical consequence. The work, we may add, enjoyed the advantage of a splendid performance, largely due to M. Lamoureux's remarkable qualities as a Conductor. M. Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, so called—really a concerto for violin in five movements—excited, perhaps, more curiosity than admiration, though there was plenty of the latter for M. Sainton's first-rate execution of the solo. The French violinist has rarely played better. As to the subject upon which he exercised his skill we will only state that experience did not commend the unceasing use of Spanish-melodic forms through all the movements of an extended work. A short and not very important extract, "Rêverie du Soir," from the "Suite Algérienne" of M. Saint-Saëns came next, followed by some fragments from M. Massenet's music to "Les Erinnyes," and the Hungarian March from Berlioz' "Faust." Among the vocal selections were a picturesque Aurora, for voice (Madame Patey) and orchestra, by M. Godard; the great air "Divinités du Styx," powerfully rendered by Madame Brunet-Lafleur, a Parisian artist of whom we look to know more; and the charming Duet, "Vous soupirez, Madame," from Berlioz' "Béatrice et Bénédict," sung to perfection by the ladies just named. Altogether the concert was most interesting, and M. Lamoureux retired from the platform with the hearty thanks of his audience.

The second performance took place on the 22nd ult., with an entirely different programme, headed by a new "Suite d'Orchestre" which M. Massenet had written for the occasion. This work contains four movements, but only three—"Cortège," "Apparition," and "Bacchanale" were played, all of which made a most favourable impression. M. Massenet's music is exactly what it pretends to be—in the "Cortège" pompous; in the "Apparition" mysterious; in the "Bacchanale" wild and rollicking. There is truth in it, therefore, and truth in art, like charity in life, "covers a multitude of sins." M. Reyers's overture to "Sigurd" followed, making an impression that it is elaborate and pretentious, out of all proportion to the results achieved. Not, so, however, with a pianoforte Concerto in F minor, composed by M. Widor, and introduced on this occasion with Madame Montigny-Rémaury at the solo instrument. M. Widor's work has many rightful claims upon attention. It is brilliant for the pianoforte, and well laid out and effective for the orchestra; but its chief merit lies in the fact that the author really has a coherent and artistic story to tell. Among things of its kind, this Concerto certainly deserves a good place. Madame Rémaury executed a somewhat difficult task like the admirable artist she is, and was loudly applauded at its close. After M. Saint-Saëns's strange and by no means lovely "Danse Macabre" (encored) came three short pianoforte pieces, following which some selections from M. Delibes's Ballet, "Sylvia" ended the Concert. Madame Brunet-Lafleur was again the vocalist, and confirmed the good impression she had previously made. In conclusion let us express a hope that M. Lamoureux may see his way to England in future years, and exhibit to us more of his country's musical talent.

BACH CHOIR.

THE twelfth public Concert of this Society took place in St. James's Hall on the 3rd ult., and was marked by a rich and varied programme—too varied, perhaps, since some confusion, both of thought and feeling, is apt to be caused when one has to pass at a bound from the antique severity of Sebastian Bach to the modern grace of Sterndale Bennett. The old Leipzig cantor contributed his church cantata, "Ich hatte viel Bekümmerniss," which was given with the "additional accompaniments" so carefully and judiciously written by Robert Franz. The work is one of the longest and most elaborate of its class—so much so that it makes large, perhaps we should say exorbitant, demands upon the patience of a general audience, and upon the antiquarian interest of connoisseurs. No doubt the St. James's Hall public heard it to the end most courteously; but it was only too clear that they sacrificed to the proprieties in so doing. It is after all a question whether the Bach cultus would not be better carried on by extracts from works like this Cantata rather than by giving them complete. The choruses, as usual, made the greatest effect, and were always gladly welcomed, especially the last, which afforded, by the way, an opportunity of comparing Bach's music to the heavenly anthem, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain," with that of Handel. The Saxon master is far and away grander and mightier here than his great contemporary, but Bach shows how he could have handled the theme under the conditions of an oratorio like the "Messiah." The solos in the Cantata were efficiently sung by Mdle. Breidenstein, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. Bennett's unpublished anthem, "To Thee, O Lord," for double chorus and organ followed, making an impression quite as favourable as when it was first produced by the Bach Choir, and being performed not less well. Palestrina's Motett "Adoramus Te," for voices alone, stimulated the desire, which this Society has created, to know yet more and more of the much talked of but exceedingly unfamiliar Italian master. It is full of noble and dignified harmony, and is a fit offering at the shrine of worship. Coming back nearer our own time, the programme next presented the "Gloria in excelsis" from Cherubini's Requiem in D, the entire work, as amateurs will remember, having been introduced last year; and in the second part came Schumann's "Requiem for Mignon," quartet by Mdle. Breidenstein, Miss Glenn, Mdle. Lallemand, and Mrs. Tuer. We have dealt elsewhere with the statement that this work was performed on the occasion "for the first time in England," but first, second, or third time, matters little, since it was highly acceptable. We may question whether Schumann should not have illustrated Goethe's touching and beautiful ceremony with more quiet and tender pathos. The music strikes us as too noisy and pretentious, but it is beautiful music all the same, and contains passages that could only have been written by its author. That it was well rendered and well received we need hardly say. Pearsall's madrigal "Light of my soul" followed, and the Concert ended with a spirited performance of Mendelssohn's magnificent finale to "Loreley," solo by Mdle. Breidenstein. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt conducted very ably, and may be congratulated, together with the members of the Choir, upon continued usefulness as a pioneer into some of the neglected regions of musical art.

THE LAY-HELPERS' ASSOCIATION.

THE Association of Lay-Helpers for the Diocese of London held, on Tuesday evening, February 28, their Annual Festival Service in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Formed in 1865 with the view of stimulating in the London Diocese the growth and organisation of gratuitous lay-help in Church work in all its many branches, the Society, by the formation of a large voluntary choir, bears testimony to the importance of music as an integral part of such work; and so—promoting, without doubt, the taste for Church music amongst its individual members—the choir appear as a united body some four or five times during the year, namely, at the Festival of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel and other sister societies at Westminster Abbey, and, as in the present instance, at their own annual Festival at St. Paul's Cathedral. The chief novelty of the Festival this year—the only novelty, in fact, except a single and a double chant, by the Conductor, Mr. W. S. Hoyte—was the performance for the first time by the Association of a new Evening Service, Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, composed specially for their festivals during the present year, by Mr. C. E. Miller. This Service is based upon the modern school of Church music, and is at times quite orchestral in its structure. The phrases are clearly defined and massively arranged, and therefore the work is admirably suited for such occasions as that for which it was composed. As regards the performance, we may say, without hesitation, that the composition was well treated by the choir, whose singing was, on the whole, remarkably creditable; and both in this and in the Anthem, Dr. Stainer's well-known "O clap your hands," Mr. Hoyte may well be complimented for the care which he had evidently bestowed upon the vocalists, and congratulated on the success which attended his labours.

The preacher was the Rev. W. Hay Aitken, whose sermon, which lasted a whole hour, was followed by "The Church's one foundation," during which time a collection was made for the Association. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. C. N. Kelly, Minor Canon, by whom also the alms were received and the final blessing given.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

ON the 15th ult. Dr. Macfarren's Oratorio "St. John the Baptist" was performed at the Bow and Bromley Institute by a band and chorus of 140 performers, the occasion being Mr. W. G. McNaught's seventh Annual Concert. This fine work was received by a large audience with unusual warmth. The singing of the choruses fully maintained the reputation of the Institute choir. The fugue, "My soul praise the Lord," based upon the tune "Hanover," was irresistibly encored, and the graphic music of the banquet scene was performed with immense effect. An unfortunate wrong entry of the harp in the chorus for female voices, "This is My beloved Son," considerably marred the effect. Miss Annie Marriott, who sang the soprano solos, was encored in the solo "I rejoice in my youth." Mrs. Bradshaw McKay sang the Narrator's part with care and finish, and Mr. F. Boyle was a successful Herod. Mr. Arthur Oswald, a rising baritone, sang with sympathetic expression, although perhaps yet lacking the repose which only a larger experience can add to his attainments. A competent band, led by Mr. Frank Amor, played the accompaniments, and Mr. Alfred Carder was at the organ. Mr. W. G. McNaught, A.R.A.M., conducted. The next performance of the choir will be on the 25th inst., when "Elijah" will be given. The usual Good Friday performance of the "Messiah" cannot take place, because the Middlesex magistrates have threatened to refuse the music licence if the performance is given. This extraordinary action has led to much comment in East-end circles.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE third Concert was given at the Town Hall, Shoreditch, on the 22nd ult., before an audience filling every part of the room. Goetz's 137th Psalm, "By the Waters of Babylon," tested the choir severely; and although, more particularly in the subdued parts, the singing was entitled to the warmest praise, there were many points which failed in effect from want of decision in the attacks. Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, "Come, let us sing," seems now advancing gradually in public estimation, and its rendering on this occasion was on the whole most satisfactory, the female voices especially being thoroughly true and sympathetic with the text. The beautiful duet, "In His hands are all the corners of the earth," was excellently sung by Mrs. Osgood and Miss Hope Glenn, and enthusiastically applauded. Mrs. Osgood also sang the soprano solos and Mr. Bernard Lane the tenor parts with much effect. Schubert's eight-part chorus, "Song of spirits floating over the waters" (performed for the first time in this country), is a composition requiring more than one hearing before any accurate judgment can be formed of its merits. The effect upon the hearer is most depressing, partially from the accompaniment for two violins, two violoncellos, and double-bass; but being written for four tenor and four bass voices, even with any brighter instrumentation we doubt very much whether it would ever make its way with a public audience. As an artistic and thoroughly musicianlike piece of writing it is, however, entitled to take high rank, and Mr. Prout deserves every credit, not only for bringing it forward, but for the pains he had evidently taken to ensure so creditable a rendering of a composition which would tax the powers of many more experienced choirs. Mendelssohn's finale to the first act of "Loreley" (with Mrs. Osgood in the principal part) was quite a feature in the concert, being charmingly rendered both by the solo vocalist and the choir. The orchestral work was Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which, considering the limited band, went exceedingly well, and created a marked effect. Mr. Ebenezer Prout was, as usual, the Conductor.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE second Concert of the season of this Society was given at Holloway Hall (owing to the rebuilding of the Highbury Athenæum) on Monday, the 14th ult., under the direction of Dr. Bridge. The performance was exceptionally interesting, including Schubert's Mass in F, Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, and Mendelssohn's Operetta "Son and Stranger." The principal soloists were Madame Blanche Cole, Mrs. McKay, Mr. Brightman, and Mr. Bridson, with Mrs. Birch at the piano. The choir and band numbered about 200. The Mass and the Fantasia (the pianoforte part capably played by Mrs. Birch) were well received, but the greatest effect was created by Mendelssohn's charming work. Although written as an Operetta, it undoubtedly lends itself admirably to concert use, particularly when, as on this occasion, the libretto is explained with sufficient clearness. Mr. Bridson created a great effect in "I'm a roamer," which he would have repeated had not the excellent rule against encores been enforced. A word of praise must be given to Madame Blanche Cole, who sang with excellent taste and dramatic power.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

AT Mr. Hallé's Concert, on February 24, the first part of the programme was devoted entirely to the works of Beethoven, and consisted of the "Leonora" overture, the terzetto "Tremati empi," and the Ninth Symphony. The performance of the overture was admirable; that of the Symphony not so fine as many we have heard, the instrumental portions being marred by several slight inaccuracies, and one notable slip in the scherzo. The choral portion was unusually well sung, but it is improbable that it will ever be perfectly rendered whilst the present high pitch is maintained. The principal vocalists were Mdlle. Breidenstein, Miss Orridge, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Santley. The former lady sang out of tune and lacked power to do full justice to her part; Miss Orridge was fairly successful and the gentlemen were entirely satisfactory. The second part of the Concert consisted of Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night." The solos were well rendered by Miss Orridge, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley, but the choir—possibly fatigued after the Symphony—did not sing with quite its usual accuracy and good tone. —On the 3rd ult. Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, Mendelssohn's Overture "Meeresstille," and Tchaikowski's fine but over-elaborate "Marche Slave"—the last-named work being a novelty here—were the principal instrumental numbers. Madame Néruda played, with Herr Straus, J. S. Bach's Concerto for two violins in D minor, with excellent effect, and gave a solo Rust's Sonata in the same key, a work admirably adapted to display her command of technique and brilliant tone. Mr. Hallé played three of Schubert's melodies, transcribed by Heller in his usual finished manner; and Madame Patey contributed songs by Beethoven, Sarti, and Anderton. —The last Concert of the series was given on the 10th ult., when Berlioz's "Faust" was repeated. The event derived additional interest from the fact that it was the five hundredth concert given in Manchester under Mr. Hallé's sole management and direction. The audience rose as Mr. Hallé entered the orchestra, and a fanfare was played in his honour. Herr Straus, as leader of the orchestra, after a short congratulatory speech, called on Mr. Lee, one of the few remaining members of the original band formed by Mr. Hallé in 1858, to read an address, in which the members of the orchestra begged Mr. Hallé's acceptance of a very handsome silver claret jug and goblets in commemoration of the event. "Faust" was given with the same vocalists as before, viz., Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Santley; and the performance was of phenomenal excellence, certainly the best we have heard. —The Gentlemen's Concert on February 28 included Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor, and Svendsen's "Rhapsodie Norvégienne." Both works were admirably played; and Madame Néruda gave the Adagio and Rondo from Vieuxtemps' Concerto in E, and Wieniawski's "Polonaise Brillante" in A, with the brilliancy and fire for which her playing is so remarkable. The vocalists were Madame Patey and Mr. Edward Lloyd. The former introduced a MS. scena by Mendelssohn, "Che vuoi mio cor," a work composed in 1824, but containing little that is characteristic of its composer. The performance was open to severe criticism; there was a lamentable lack of unanimity between the singer and the orchestra, and it was evident that the rehearsal—if any—had been of the most nominal description. —On the 16th ult. a classical Chamber Concert was given, at which Herr Joachim, Herr Straus, Signor Piatti, and Mr. Charles Hallé were the artists. Beethoven's Trio for violin, viola, and violoncello in C minor, Op. 9, No. 3, and Schumann's Trio for piano, violin, and violoncello in F, Op. 80, were both splendidly played. Herr Joachim and Mr. Hallé gave Brahms's Sonata for piano and violin in G, Op. 78, and five Hungarian Dances by Brahms and Joachim. The great violinist played with all his unequalled breadth of style, grandeur of tone, and technical perfection, and Mr. Hallé was, of course, a most able colleague. Signor Piatti selected for solo performance a Romanza and Caprice from his own pen, works which afforded him ample scope for the display of his unique abilities, and Mr. King contributed several songs. —Mr. De Jong gave his annual benefit Concert on the 5th ult. in the Free Trade Hall. The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Clara Samuël, Madame Trebelli, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Redfern Hollins, Mr. Maas, and Signor Foli. The hall was crowded in every part. —The Manchester Vocal Society gave its last Concert of the series on the 9th ult. The programme consisted of glees, part-songs, &c., all of which were well rendered. Miss Nunn was the solo vocalist. —The Athenæum Choral Society gave a very successful Concert on February 28. The choir sang with an unusual degree of refinement, and sundry songs were well rendered by members of the Society.

DR. STONE "ON THE COMBINATION OF VOICES WITH MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS."

DR. W. H. STONE is very happy in the choice of subjects in his lectures, which cleverly combine novelty, entertainment, and instruction. The lecture he delivered at the London Institution, on the 17th ult., "On the Combination of Voices with Musical Instruments," was unusually novel and interesting. The Institution in Finsbury Circus was densely crowded; and the audience throughout the lecture was visibly attentive and pleased. The general design of Dr. Stone's lecture was to describe the separate elements of pleasure in vocal and instrumental music, and to practically illustrate the manner in which those elements are combined by musical composers, and made to heighten and adorn the effects peculiar to each. Following his syllabus, Dr. Stone characterised instrumental music as "sensorial," inasmuch as its effects are largely dependent on the sensations of tone or on quality of tone. Vocal music, he seems to think, intensifies the sensory element by adding an intellectual factor; hence its vast range and power. Quality of tone, and the combination of qualities in different instruments, he compared to harmony of colours without decided form or meaning, as in some specimens of Eastern tapestry and ornamental fabrics. The human voice he described as surpassing all other instruments on account of its double capacity; firstly as a sound-producing instrument, as far as the operation of the larynx was concerned; and secondly as a sound-modifying instrument; the latter property being due to the differences of timbre occasioned by the emission of the voice through the cavities of the mouth under varying conditions. Supposing that by this additional power, and the power of using the ordinary articulations of speech in song, the voice alone can give a definite meaning to music, Dr. Stone defines an "obligato" instrumental part as specially intended by the composer to colour and heighten the effect of the words sung; and this is accomplished by four distinct devices; the pictorial and imitative; the development of a musical idea; the introduction of strange or little-used instruments; and by the appeal to the imagination through the power of association. To illustrate his theory of the "obligato," Dr. Stone had gathered together quite a little band of picked artists: Mr. T. Harper, trumpet; Mr. Enthoven, violin; Mr. Beilshmidt, violoncello; Mr. E. L. Barrett, flute; Mr. L. Beddome, clarinet; Mr. Manners, French horn; Mr. H. R. Bird, pianoforte. Mr. Barrett took also the piccolo, and Mr. Beddome the basset-horn; the viol d'amore, a now rarely heard instrument, was played by Mr. Zeller, a connoisseur, and band-master of one of our cavalry regiments. The vocalists were Miss Cornish, Mr. Dalzell and Mr. Bevan. Mrs. Marshall was announced to appear, but was prevented from fulfilling her engagement by indisposition. Her place was admirably filled by a young lady we understood to be Miss Mann. The programme was as follows:

1. "Haste, ye Shepherds" (Soprano with Flute) Bach.
2. "O, ruddier than the Cherry" (Bass with Piccolo) Handel.
3. "Mein gläubiges Herz" (Soprano with Cello) Bach.
4. "Mirth admit me" (Bass with French Horn) Handel.
5. "Non temer" (Soprano and Violin) Mozart.
6. "Ave Maria" (Tenor with Clarinet) Cherubini.
7. "Non più di fiori" (Soprano with Basset-horn) Mozart.
8. "Più Bianca" (Tenor with Viol d'Amore) Meyerbeer.
9. "Let the bright Seraphim" (Soprano with Trumpet) Handel.
10. "Be thou faithful" (Tenor with Cello and other instruments) Mendelssohn.

The programme itself pretty well describes the effects intended by the use of the obligato instruments. Most people would at once associate the sound of the flute with the truly Lydian pastoral by Bach. The pipe of Polyphemus, though made of "reeds of decent growth," is well enough represented in the accompaniment to Handel's song from "Acis and Galatea" by the piccolo, in contrast to the assumed "thirty-two-foot tone" of the giant's voice. As for the tone-painting qualities of the viol d'amore, with its second set of sympathetic strings, the instrument could only have been employed in Meyerbeer's opera "Les Huguenots" as an historic fancy, just as he might have employed the lute en scène, as a bit of realistic stage furniture.

Dr. Stone spoke of the instrument as of the "viol" family. As representing quality of tone the term viol is more easily understood than explained. The resonance of the second set of strings does certainly give to the viol d'amore a kind of Eolian harp-like effect; but without any disrespect to the "family" its tone was more or less like that of a fiddle without a sound-post. It can surely be laid aside with the lute. On the other hand, another uncommon obligato instrument, the basset-horn, by reason of its blending powers in the lower register of the instrument, as shown in the accompaniment to Mozart's aria "Non più di fiori," and in its higher register by reason of its marvellous imitation of the timbre of the female voice, will maintain for itself a place in the modern orchestral colour-box; which, to confess the truth, wants all the recruits it can get in these days of Berlioz revivals, when so little that is new is forthcoming in regard to form or idea, and we depend more and more on the "sensorial element." In "Mirth admit me," Dr. Stone has succeeded in unearthing, as he tells us, from the pile of manuscripts in the British Museum a capital song with horn obligato by Handel. The air is simple enough, and one might say conventional enough, but it is breezy and healthy, and moreover thoroughly English in character. Finally, in Handel's "Let the bright Seraphim," Mr. Harper's trumpet was of as dazzling a hue as ever; and Dr. Stone could not have shown us better what good quality of tone is, and what it is not, than by contrasting the bright tones of the trumpet with the thud and thump of the piano. Dr. Stone's lecture with musical illustrations suggests two valuable lessons to concert-givers of the period. In the first place the entertainment was of the right length, and every one waited cheerfully until the last note was played. St. James's Hall and other places are often half-emptied before the concert concludes, as people are naturally bored to death with nearly three hours of music. Secondly, the additional colour in the accompaniments to vocal music, by the assistance of one or two other instruments besides the pianoforte, will soon be demanded by the public. For the female and epicene portions of an audience the domestic associations of the piano may suffice; but with present-day habits and æsthetical pretensions, the tinkle of a piano in a concert-room suggests anything but artistic associations. It is quite understood that as a solo instrument the pianoforte has no rival in completeness and independence. Dr. Stone's modest heading to his syllabus—"On the Combination of Voices with Musical Instruments"—lays no claim to a hyper-æsthetical and Ruskin-like crusade on behalf of colour; indeed, from his remarks on the prosaic rhythm of Wordsworth and, in some instances, Tennyson, and his praise of the musical metre of Shelley and Moore, we may presume he is rather of the art-for-art school; and would lean rather to Handel and Mozart, than to Berlioz and Wagner. But his efforts at least indirectly tend to the extinction of the puritanical worship of whiteness; and we hope he will pursue the happy idea represented in his last lecture. The only danger—and one faintly suggested by Dr. Stone himself—is that a public of low æsthetical culture, and of little independent judgment in such matters, is liable, under the influence of partisan criticism, to flop over like a gelatinous mass from Handelian "divisions" to symphonies in silver and blue, or even to unintelligible daubs in super-artistic neutral tints. The further evil is that with an English public the appreciation of "divisions" and of the defined and the absolute is honest, whilst the national or general appreciation of a sensuous and ultra-imaginative art never can be; nor is it very desirable from higher considerations, moral and political, that it should be otherwise. It has often been observed that in the iridescence or phosphorescence of hyper-sensuous art there is a taint of corruption.

THE Concert given at the Royal Academy of Music on Monday evening, the 14th ult., in aid of "The Henry Smart Memorial Fund," was well attended, and passed off in every way successfully. The programme consisted entirely of Smart's music, and although a complete work, either sacred or secular, showing the talents of the composer when exerted in the highest order of music, would have been more acceptable, yet it is but justice to say that the selection of miscellaneous pieces was, on the whole, judiciously made. Sometimes, however, the similarity of key of the numbers seemed not to have been sufficiently guarded against by the framers of the programme. The monotony therefore which necessarily arises in the performance of nineteen numbers by the same author, written without the relief observed in planning a work of unity, was not fully obviated. Each piece, however, was worthy of the talented composer, and received careful representation from capable executants. Henry Smart was a fine organist, and wrote well for his beloved instrument. Six well-known performers showed their admiration for, and their devotion to, the deceased master by playing compositions written especially for the organ. Dr. Chipp selected the Andante in A, Dr. F. E. Gladstone the solo, "En forme d'Ouverture," and Dr. Verrinder the march Allegro pomposo; whilst Mr. Hoyte chose the Postlude in D, Mr. H. R. Rose the Choral in A, and Mr. E. H. Turpin the last composition of Henry Smart, an Andante in A. It need not be said that each executant did justice to his share of these admirable works. The singers were many and excellent; and they certainly found in Mr. Henry Smart's vocal music good materials for the exercise of their abilities. Smart wrote admirably for the voice, and throughout his songs—and he composed a very large number—there runs a current of healthy English quality. Miss Marian M'Kenzie, by a capital reading, gave an excellent specimen of it in "The Lady of the Lea," and Miss Orridge asserted its unaffected merits in "The Sailor's Story." Miss Florence Norman pleased the audience greatly by her singing of "Love and Hope," in which she had the co-operation of the violinist, M. Victor Buziau. The agreeable voice of Miss Spencer Jones was heard in "The Maiden's Prayer," and Miss Thudichum did good service in the concerted music. Messrs. Davies, Miles, Hilton, Smith, and W. H. Cummings also contributed to the vocal portion of the programme, the latter gentleman singing "Paquita" in excellent style. Mr. Eayres conducted the performance of the part-songs, and Messrs. Henry R. Bird, Charles E. Stephens, and E. H. Thorne were the pianists.

It is with feelings of the deepest regret that we have to record the entire destruction of the Opera House, at Nice, by fire on the 23rd ult., the lives lost in the catastrophe including several of the artists who were about to appear in the Opera of the evening. The Paris correspondent of the Daily Chronicle gives the following account of the accident:—

The building was full, for a gala representation was being given of "Lucia di Lammermoor," the prima donna being Signora Bianca Donadio. At a little after 8.30 p.m. a gas jet set fire to the "flies" and drapery, and in the twinkling of an eye the whole stage was in flames. The members of the company were in their dressing-gowns. In another five minutes there was an explosion of gas, and the front of the house and the corridors were in darkness, with the exception of the lurid and terrifying glare of the ever-increasing conflagration. The panic at this moment became appalling. A rush was made for the doors, and it is feared that many were trampled to death. Signora Donadio was saved almost miraculously, but the baritone, basso, and several other artists perished in the flames. The tenor was last seen at a window, enveloped in flames and screaming for help. At midnight a hundred dead bodies had been taken to the Church of St. Vincent de Paul, Rue St. François de Paul. Some had been burnt literally to skeletons. The despairing scenes around the theatre were heartrending. One woman, whose husband also perished, has committed suicide. Among the dead are five members of one family. The cause of the disaster was the explosion of gas, which created a panic, during which the flames spread to the roof. Most of those who perished were occupants of the gallery. The prefect, M. Brancion, the English vice-consul, the sailors, the Christian Brothers, and the clergy were indefatigable in their attentions to the injured. A terrible gloom has fallen over the town, which was preparing for the regatta fêtes.

Amongst the victims of the calamity are three members of the family of Mr. David Kennedy, of Edinburgh, a well-known Scottish vocalist. They are James Kennedy, twenty-three years of age, Kate Kennedy, nineteen, and Lizzie Kennedy, seventeen. They were studying at Nice, under Signor Lamperti, and were all of great promise as singers. It is almost needless to say that the regatta fêtes have been abandoned; and we are glad to add that the subscriptions for the widows and orphans of those who perished in the conflagration have already reached the sum of 100,000 francs.

A PIANOFORTE Recital was given by Mr. Walter Bache at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, the 1st ult. It was perhaps wise on the part of the bénéficiaire to determine on having a recital this year, in lieu of his usual orchestral concert, for, without doubt, the expenses of a large band and chorus are not to be lightly undertaken. Certainly the support received by Mr. Bache on the afternoon in question was hardly encouraging, for the hall was but poorly filled, and some present appeared to view the proceedings with but little enthusiasm. Probably the fact that the programme contained no startling novelty might account for the want of interest, but it nevertheless must be trying to such a true and conscientious artist as Mr. Bache, to find his earnest endeavours receive such scant recognition. Bach's "Fantasia Cromatica e Fuga," the opening item of the programme, served to show Mr. Bache's cultured powers to considerable advantage. All the points were well brought out, the phrasing was remarkably good, and the entire execution of the difficult piece neat and highly finished. The Sonata in A major (Op. 101), Beethoven, which followed, was scarcely so well rendered, for the mannerisms of the school to which Mr. Bache belongs were more prominent than desirable. The only composition from the pen of Liszt which the programme contained was "Bénédiction de Dieu dans la solitude." When heard at the Recital given by Mr. Bache last November, the impression this work made was not altogether pleasant, and after a second hearing the opinion is even less favourable, for although it contains many agreeable fancies, it is occasionally dull, and in no one particular does it rise above the ordinary "Morceau de Salon." Chopin, Bülow, Weber, and Mendelssohn supplied the remaining portion of the programme, each receiving due justice at the hands of Mr. Bache. Miss Orridge sang three songs of Schumann with considerable success.

THE second of the present series of excellent performances of classical chamber music, given under the title of "Denmark Hill Concerts" at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, took place on Wednesday evening, the 9th ult., when especial interest was given to the occasion by the rentrée of Herr Joachim in South London, who was received with much enthusiasm, and greeted with the warmest applause after his fine performance of four numbers of the new set of Hungarian Dances by Brahms. The pianoforte accompaniments were played by Herr Ignaz Brüll, whose soli were Romance, Op. 38 (Brüll); Rhapsodie, Op. 79, No. 2 (Brahms); and Presto, Op. 7 (Mendelssohn). The programme also included Mozart's Quartet in G major, No. 1, and Schumann's Trio in D minor, Op. 63, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti being the executants, besides those already named. Miss Spencer Jones contributed, with decided success, Cowen's "Better Land," and "Morning Prayer" from Costa's "Eli." At the third Concert, given on the 22nd ult., Herr Barth was the solo pianist, and executed with much excellence Nachtstück (Schumann), Nocturne (Chopin), and Allegro (Scarlatti). Herr Joachim was again the leading violinist, and played with his accustomed skill Viotti's Adagio in E, from twenty-second Concerto, Prelude in E, by Bach, and, responding to prolonged applause, introduced the Minuet and Gavotte from the same Suite as the composition lastly mentioned. The two remaining items in the programme were Brahms's Quartet in G minor, Op. 25, excellently rendered by MM. Barth, Joachim, Zerbini, and Piatti, and Beethoven's Quartet in F, Op. 18, No. 1, MM. Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. Mdle. Rosenthal was the vocalist, and M. Zerbini acted as accompanist at each concert.

WE extract with much pleasure, from the Daily News of the 9th ult., the following account of the recently established Concerts for the People:—

The success which has attended the efforts of the People's Entertainment Society to inculcate a better taste in music has emboldened the promoters of that association to endeavour to reach a still humbler class of persons than any who have as yet benefited by their excellent performances in suburban London. For the seventh fortnightly entertainment of the season the large school-room of St. Mary's Schools, Whitechapel, had been secured, and here last evening a vast audience, composed of the lowest class of residents in the neighbourhood, assembled. As usual, no charge was made for admission; but as it has been found that by the system of free admission to all comes a great many of those for whom these concerts are given are apt to be crowded out, tickets of admission had been distributed, with the aid of the district inspector of police, among the occupants of the common lodging-houses and rookeries about. The programme put forth had one fault, if fault it could be called, that of being suited only to the comprehension of more cultivated hearers. Schumann's "Trauerrie," for instance, and a Gavotte by Boyce, admirably as they were performed upon the violin by Mr. W. H. Leslie, can scarcely be said to have had any peculiar appropriateness to the occasion; and the same may be said of Chopin's Valse in A flat, which was played upon the pianoforte by Mr. W. S. Hoyte. However, the orderly, if somewhat boisterous, assemblage present were unmistakably what actors term a "good audience," receiving the different items with almost indiscriminating enthusiasm. Perhaps the piece which afforded the greatest pleasure was Mr. Alfred Scott Gatty's comic song, "Sarah Jane's Tea Party," humorously sung by the composer himself, and evidently heartily enjoyed, although Lady Folkestone's artistic vocalisation earned her no less applause. Among the other performers, all of whom received encores, were Miss Mackenzie, Mr. G. Power, and Mr. Marriner. To Lady Folkestone a graceful and unexpected compliment was paid by a young man, a worker in artificial flowers, who publicly presented her with a bouquet made by himself. Lord Folkestone acknowledged the gift, and at the same time spoke a few words of welcome, and promised that two or three more performances should be given in Whitechapel at intervals of a fortnight.

THE prospectus of the Royal Italian Opera for the coming season includes amongst the promised singers the following new comers: Sopranos, Mdle. Josephine de Reszké, Madame Fursch-Madier, Mdle. Elly Warnots, and Mdle. Guercia; tenors, Signori Mierzwinsky, Labatt, Perugini, and M. Vergnet; baritones, Signor Sante Athos and Herr Bulss; and basses, M. Dauphin, M. Gresse, and Mr. Griffin. Mesdames Adelina Patti, Albani, Alwina Valleria, Sembrich, and Scalchi, Signori Nicolini and Gayarre, M. Lassalle, and most of those vocalists who are now annually looked for at this establishment are also included, and the list may therefore be termed an unusually strong one. The most important novelty announced is Rubinstein's Opera "Il Demonio," about the merits of which we have heard highly favourable reports; and an interesting production during the season will assuredly be Mozart's "Il Seraglio" (the principal character by Madame Sembrich); although it seems strange that we should have to mention it as a "novelty," Rossini's "Otello" will also be revived; and, "if time should permit," Boito's "Mefistofele." Signor Bevignani and M. Joseph Dupont are named as "conductors, composers, and directors of the music"; but we may presume that the first-named artist will be virtually the Conductor of the season. Tuesday, the 19th inst., is announced as the opening night.

MR. A. C. MACKENZIE'S "Burns," Second Scotch Rhapsody for Orchestra, was performed with great success at the extra Symphony Concert at Wiesbaden on February 25, under Herr Louis Lüstner. Performances of this work have been, or will shortly be, given at Vienna, under Herr Hans Richter; at Buda-Pest, under Herr Erkal; and at Zurich, under Herr F. Hegar. The recent performance of the same composer's first Scotch Rhapsody by the Società Orchestrale of Florence, has been followed by a very admirable rendering of his Quartet for pianoforte and stringed instruments, Op. 11, at the first concert of the second series of the Matinées Musicales given by Signori Buonamici, Sbolci, and Chiostri. The execution of this interesting and clever work was faultless, and its merits were warmly appreciated by a numerous and artistic audience. In the treatment of his melodious subjects, Mr. Mackenzie shows decided individuality; and it is evident that with sound training and excellent workmanship acquired abroad, he combines that wealth of musical ideas which is the peculiar charm and characteristic of his native muse. All this augurs extremely well for the future career of a composer who has already done such valuable and such successful work; and therefore, "avanti sempre Scizia!"

THE Brixton Choral Society gave its third Concert of the season, at Angell Town Institution, on Monday evening, February 28, before a crowded audience. Mr. Arthur Sullivan's Oratorio "The Prodigal Son" formed the first subject of performance, and, upon the whole, the delivery of the choral numbers may be pronounced worthy of decided praise, though weak attack and some uncertainty in intonation were occasionally displayed. The principal soprano part found an excellent exponent in Miss Catherine Penna, who sang with much delicacy and artistic feeling. Miss Marian Burton intelligently interpreted the contralto solos, but was less successful when associated with the other principals. The tenor and bass solos were efficiently sung by Mr. Henry Guy and Mr. F. Bevan respectively. The second part of the programme was occupied by Rossini's "Stabat Mater," to which the foregoing comments may be applied. Special mention is, however, due to Miss Penna for her interpretation of the air "Inflammatus." Mr. John Harrison rendered valuable assistance at the pianoforte, and Mr. Charles Wilkes acted as organist. Mr. William Lemare conducted with his usual care, but under distressing circumstances—only three days after the almost sudden death of Mr. Tolman Lemare, a gentleman well known in connection with the Society.

THE St. Andrew's Choral Society gave its first miscellaneous Concert in the Athenæum, Goldhawk Road, on Wednesday evening, the 16th ult. The favourable impression at first produced upon the audience was sustained throughout the evening, several of the pieces being performed with the utmost precision by the choir, and the solos being rendered in a highly artistic manner. Callcott's humorous glee, "Aldiborontiphosphornio," was given with such spirit and animation that it had to be repeated. The trio, "Hearts feel that love Thee," was very well sung by Mrs. Miller, Mrs. H. W. Young, and Miss Florence Burchett, and deserved the encore with which it was greeted. Mrs. Saunders and Miss Lee sang "The Wanderer's song," Miss Doig, R.A.M., gave "Orpheus with his lute," and Miss L. Somerville "The voice of the sea." The latter was encored, and Miss Somerville, in response, sang "The rose of May." Mr. Alfred Greenwood and Mr. J. T. Hutchenson also contributed several songs, solos, and duets, all of which elicited loud applause. One of the most attractive features of the evening was the Toy Symphony, which was cleverly performed, and elicited cordial approval. Mr. Partridge, A.R.A.M., conducted with his accustomed efficiency.

THE London members of the Tonic Sol-fa Composition Club gave a Concert at Gifford Hall, Caledonian Road, on Saturday, the 12th ult. The choir, comprising sixty voices, was under the direction of Mr. W. T. Deane. The original pieces comprised a chorus, "Sing, O ye heavens" (H. D. Houghton); trio and chorus, "O come all ye faithful" (W. Meston); anthem, "Out of the depths" (A. P. Burr); part-song, "Christmas Bells" (W. T. Deane); a catch, "Where is the man" (W. N. Smith); and a very effective nautical ballad and chorus, "Barney's consolation," sung by the composer, Mr. George Merritt, and encored. The other portion of the programme consisted of well-known pieces. The solo vocalists were Miss Louise Crofton and Mr. W. T. Deane. Miss Deane presided at the piano, and Mr. Deane at the harmonium. Raff's Canzona for violin and piano was well played by Mr. Goodworth and Miss Deane; and the catch, "'Twas you, sir," by Messrs. George Oakey, Burr, and Merritt, was encored. The choruses were well sung.

THE Highgate Choral Society gave its second Concert on the 1st ult., the work selected for performance being Mr. Sullivan's musical drama "The Martyr of Antioch." On the whole the rendering of the composition was highly successful, the singing of the choruses in particular leaving little to be desired. Of the principals, Miss Marian Jones, of the National Training School, who undertook at very short notice the trying part of Margarita, acquitted herself very much to the satisfaction of the audience. Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke was also successful in the contralto airs. The tenor and bass solos were respectively taken by Mr. George Cox, of St. Andrew's, Wells Street, and Mr. Frank Elmore. The orchestra included several well-known performers, and was under the leadership of Mr. Earnshaw, of the Royal Italian Opera. Mr. G. F. Huntley, of Windsor, presided at the harmonium, and Mr. Worsley Staniforth conducted.

MISS HELENE SPRINGMÜHL'S second Concert took place at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on Thursday, the 10th ult. An excellent and varied programme, comprising high-class vocal and instrumental music, was exceedingly well rendered. Miss Springmühl chose for her principal piece a Sonata by Schumann, her excellent performance of which made a most favourable impression. No less successful were the two duets, Moscheles' "Homage à Handel" and Raff's "Tarantelle," played by the Misses Helene and Genevieve Springmühl. The vocalists were

Mr. Henry Guy, Miss Kathleen Grant, and Mr. Charles Bevan. A flute solo was given by Mr. H. Seward, a member of the Belsize Amateur Orchestral Society, which was well received. The concert concluded with Brahms's Quartet "Liebeslieder" (Love Song Waltzes), in which Miss Kathleen Grant, Mrs. Bradshawe McKay, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Charles Bevan were the vocalists.

WE hear with pleasure that a subscription has been started for the purpose of erecting, in Hereford Cathedral, a suitable memorial to the late Organist of the Cathedral, Mr. Townshend Smith. A brass plate has already been placed near the organ by Mrs. Smith, and it is now proposed to erect above this a mural tablet, incised on alabaster or marble, filled in with inlaid marble of various colours. The design, suggested by the Rev. F. T. Havergal, Sub-Treasurer of the Cathedral, is to be the figure of an angel holding a musical instrument. The execution of the tablet is to be placed in the hands of Messrs. Clayton and Bell. The idea has originated among a few old choristers and pupils of Mr. Smith, and subscriptions, which will be limited to "Old Chorister Boys," will be gladly received by the Rev. A. R. With, 7, Holly Place, Hampstead, or Mr. S. P. Barnby, 20, Roderick Road, Mansfield Road, N.W., who are acting as secretaries.

ABOUT ten years since the success of some small Oratorio Concerts at Worthing induced a few musical amateurs to found the now flourishing Worthing Sacred Harmonic Society. In 1872 the first Concert was given; and, since then, many of the standard sacred works have been performed, and some of the most eminent artists engaged. The prospectus now before us for the present season shows that the Society has resolved to give what may be fairly termed a two days' festival. On the first day Costa's "Eli" is to be performed, and on the second a miscellaneous Concert. Miss Robertson, Miss De Fonblanque, Madame J. Pratt, Mr. Hollins, Mr. C. Henry, and Mr. Bridson are engaged as vocalists; and there will be an excellent orchestra, with Mr. Willing at the organ, and Mr. L. S. Palmer as Conductor. The Concerts take place in Easter week.

ON Monday, the 21st ult., a Concert was given in Wellington Hall, Islington, by the members of the Claremont Choral Society; Conductor, Mr. T. P. Coldrey. The first part consisted of Van Bree's Cantata, "St. Cecilia's Day," Miss Nellie McEwen taking the soprano solos. The choruses were well sung, the last number, "Holy Music," with soprano solo, being redemanded. A miscellaneous selection and the "Jackdaw of Rheims," by G. Fox, formed the second part. The solos were taken by Misses Nellie McEwen, and Maud Longhurst, Messrs. G. Micklewood, and G. Minet, all of whom were very successful. The choir, fifty in number, were prompt in attack, and performed the music allotted them in a praiseworthy manner.

MR. WALTER WESCHÉ gave an Organ Recital at Lancaster Hall, Notting Hill, on February 26, assisted by Mrs. Osgood, Miss Lennon, Mr. Stanley Smith, and a small orchestra, under the direction of Mr. F. Docker. The principal organ solos were Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat, Bach's G minor Fugue, and the Overture to "William Tell." The band was heard to advantage in an "Idyll" for organ and strings, and an Overture, "Dagmar," for organ and orchestra, the compositions of Mr. Wesché. Mrs. Osgood sang in her usual finished style "Ave Maria" (Verdi) and a new song by Mr. Wesché; Miss Lennon gave songs by Vaccaj and Ferri, and Mr. Stanley Smith's singing aided materially the success of the evening. Mr. F. Docker conducted with much ability.

WE regret sincerely to announce the death, on the 25th ult., of Mr. Jean Baptiste Wolf, partner in the London house of the celebrated publishing firm of Messrs. Schott and Co., after a long illness, at his residence, Fellows' Road, Regent's Park. Mr. Wolf's uniform courtesy towards all foreign artists visiting England, and the aid he afforded them in their professional career, had long endeared him to all with whom he was brought in connection; and his loss will be deeply felt by a wide circle of artistic, as well as private, friends.

A VOCAL and instrumental Concert was given in the Methodist Chapel, Jubilee Street, Mile End, on Monday, the 7th ult., by a choir of about forty voices, selected from the Tonic Sol-fa classes of Poplar, Old Ford, and Stratford. The Concert was under the conductorship of Mr. T. R. J. Ames. The pieces chosen were almost exclusively of a sacred character, and were given in an excellent manner, especially the anthem "In Jewry is God known," by the choir, band, and harmonium. The soloists were Miss Braine and Miss Cole. The violin solos of Mr. L. W. Schweitzer, were a feature of the Concert. The accompaniments were efficiently rendered by Mr. White, organist of St. Peter's.

An operatic Cantata entitled "The Blind Beggar's Daughter of Bethnal Green," by A. Gollmick, was produced with much success by the Kilburn Musical Association on Tuesday, the 1st ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Hüttl, Mrs. More, Messrs. Ben Davies, Walter F. Clare, and Stanley Smith. The choruses, which are very bright, were excellently sung by the choir. The second part of the programme included some pianoforte solos by Miss Helen Hopekirk, who was recalled (as was also Mr. Ben Davies for "The Message"), two songs by Miss Burnett, and three part-songs by the choir. Miss Gollmick was an able accompanist, and Mr. A. Gollmick conducted.

AT a special Service at St. Matthias', Earl's Court, on Friday, the 11th ult., a new Cantata, "Give Eternal Rest," adapted to the music of a Requiem composed for Mr. Faulkner Leigh's choir by J. H. Bonawitz, was successfully performed for the first time with full orchestra and chorus, conducted by the composer: the tenor solos were sung by Mr. Faulkner Leigh. A Symphony in D flat, by Eaton Fanning, was also given, and an orchestral movement by the French composer, Massenet. The tenor song, "I heard the voice of Jesus say" (Coenen), was sung with much devotional feeling by Mr. Faulkner Leigh, the director of the choir.

AT the monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society, given at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday, the 18th ult., the principal items in the programme were Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Spohr's "God, Thou art great." The solos in the former were rendered by Miss Jannette Adam, Miss Burman, Mr. T. P. Frame and Mr. W. Lloyd, and those in the latter by Miss Annie Daymond, R.A.M., Mrs. Luff, Mr. Frame and Mr. Arthur Baxter. A miscellaneous selection of solos and choruses from well-known oratorios was also given. Miss Florence Hartley accompanied at the pianoforte, and Mr. Walter G. Hammond at the American organ. Mr. G. R. Egerton conducted.

MR. J. S. CURWEN, President of the Tonic Sol-fa College, has just returned from a series of conferences with friends and teachers of the system in Bradford, Leeds, Manchester, Liverpool, and Birmingham. The reports of the progress of the movement have been most satisfactory. Mr. Curwen calls attention to the fact that out of the last 7,400 musical certificates granted by the Tonic Sol-fa College, 5,081 included an examination in sight-singing from the ordinary staff notation. He also dwells on the need of educating teachers in taste and skill, and of carrying the training of pupils to a higher point before they are drafted into Choral Societies.

THE second Concert of the season of the Crouch End Choral Society took place at Christ Church School-room on the 1st ult. before a crowded audience, Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" occupied the first part of the Concert and was exceedingly well received. The composer (who was present) was much applauded. The other item in the programme was J. G. Callcott's "Golden Harvest." The soloists were Madame Worrell, Miss Lizzie Turner, Messrs. Weston and Blower. Mr. J. D. Grimson led the band, Mr. H. J. B. Dart presided at the piano, and Mr. A. J. Dye conducted.

THE entire stock and copyright of the works hitherto published by Messrs. Neumeyer and Co., of Neumeyer Hall, have been purchased by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. The catalogue includes the whole of the valuable compositions of Heinrich Hofmann.

THE seventh annual Concert of the Violin Class, under the direction of Mr. Fitzhenry, took place at the Birkbeck Institution on the 5th ult. The soloists were Miss Leonora Braham, Miss Marian M'Kenzie, Mr. E. Bryant, and Mr. Thurely Beale, and Mr. T. E. Gatehouse (violin). A varied programme was gone through, much to the satisfaction of a large audience, who insisted on several encores; the members of the Violin Class being heard to advantage in a Fantasia and a selection of Scotch airs. Miss J. Gatehouse and Mr. C. Davieson were efficient accompanists.

It is anticipated that this year's Festival of the London Gregorian Choral Association will be more than usually solemn, for on the morning of Thursday, May 19, a celebration in one of the City churches will be given; and in the evening, at the Festal Evensong at St. Paul's Cathedral, the Service will be accompanied by a military band, as on the occasion of the Service of the Guild of the Holy Standard. The Festival Service of this latter Society will be held in the Wellington Barracks Chapel during the month of June.

MR. T. A. ALDERSON'S Choir, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, is announced to reassemble for the season 1881-2 on Wednesday evenings and Friday afternoons, commencing on the last Wednesday in September next. The following works have been chosen for rehearsal: "Melusina" (H. Hofmann), "Boadicea" (Dr. J. F. Bridge), "Columbus" (H. Gadsby)—the new work for male voices successfully produced at the Crystal Palace on the 19th ult.—"Christmas Eve" (Niels W. Gade), and "King René's Daughter" (H. Smart).

MR. EYRE gave the following programme at the Organ Recital at the Bow and Bromley Institute on Saturday, the 12th ult: Overture, "Henry VIII." (Sullivan); Adagio from a Quartet (Spohr); Concert Fugue, in G (Krebs); Minuet and Trio from G Minor Symphony (W. S. Bennett); Allegro Moderato, from an Organ Sonata (F. E. Gladstone); Andante quasi Allegretto (C. E. Stephens); Gavotte, "Mignon" (A. Thomas); Allegro Finale and Fugue on "Rule Britannia," from an Organ Sonata (G. A. Macfarren).

THE Academical Board of Trinity College announce their intention to undertake the examination of Church choirs and other choral bodies. The choir or society will be tested in a short cantata, sacred or secular (not to exceed one hour in performance); a fugal chorus from a standard work; sight-singing tests for each part, to be sung from a black board, or a short anthem or part-song to be sung at sight. Certificates of merit will be granted, which will continue in force for the period of one year from the date of examination.

A PERFORMANCE of Root's new Cantata "Under the Palms" was given on Wednesday evening, the 9th ult., in Finsbury Chapel. The band and chorus numbered 150, and the solo vocalists were Miss Kate Heath, Madame Arnold Potter, Mr. Alfred Speer, and Mr. William Tozer. Organ, Mr. Alfred Eborn; Conductor, Mr. W. G. Balcarras. The music was exceedingly well rendered, great credit being due to the conductor for his judicious training of the choir.

THE Daily Telegraph of the 26th ult. says: "Many of your readers will be disappointed to learn that the performances, which it was intended to give this season at Covent Garden, of the 'Nibelungen Trilogy,' under Richard Wagner's direction, cannot take place on account of certain unexpected difficulties that arose just at the moment that the affair seemed to be settled. It is hoped that the scheme will be carried out next year."

THE works to be performed at the forthcoming Norwich Festival will comprise Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and "St. Paul," Handel's "Messiah," Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," and new works by Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. F. H. Cowen, and Mr. J. F. Barnett. The artists engaged are Madame Albani, Mrs. Osgood, Miss Mary Davies, Mesdames Patey and Mudie-Bolingbroke, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Barton M'Guckin, F. King, and Santley. Signor Randegger will be the Conductor.

THE post of Organist to Salisbury Cathedral has become vacant by the resignation, owing to ill-health, of Mr. J. E. Richardson, who has held the post since 1863, in which year he was appointed Organist on the death of Mr. A. T. Corfe, having for some time previously acted as Assistant-Organist. A vacancy has also arisen at the church of St. Martin, Scarborough, consequent upon the appointment of Dr. Wm. Creser to the organistship of the parish church of Leeds, held for many years past by Mr. R. S. Burton.

A GRAND Festival Service will be held in York Minster on Thursday, July 7, in which the cathedral choirs of York, Durham, and Ripon, together with the more efficient surplined choirs of the three dioceses, will take part. The feature of the service (particulars of which will be found in our correspondence columns) will be the production of a new church Cantata "St. John the Evangelist," composed for the occasion by Dr. Armes, of Durham.

MR. ARTHUR SULLIVAN has resigned his appointment as Principal of the National Training School. We understand that some two years since he tendered his resignation, but, at the desire of the Committee of Management, consented to withdraw it temporarily, and hold the office until Easter next, when the period of five years, for which he originally undertook the duties, will expire.

THE fifth meeting of the seventh session of the Musical Association was held on Monday, the 7th ult., when a Paper was read by Mr. C. A. Barry, M.A., "Introductory to the Study of Wagner's comic Opera, 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg.'" Messrs. G. A. Osborne, E. Prout, H. F. Frost, and Major Crawford took part in the discussion which followed.

BACH'S "St. Matthew Passion" will be given at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, on the first two Fridays of the present month. The performance of the "St. John Passion" will be continued at St. Anne's, Soho, on the remaining Friday evenings in Lent, at 8 p.m., excepting the Good Friday performance, which will be at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

WE hear that a Committee, including the names of the most eminent musicians in this country, has been formed for the purpose of presenting a testimonial to Mr. A. Manns, in recognition of the great service rendered to the art of music by the twenty-five series of classical Concerts he has conducted at the Crystal Palace.

WE understand that Mr. H. C. Richards has resigned the office of secretary to the London Gregorian Choral Association, and has been succeeded by Mr. Herbert M. Low, a gentleman who has for some years been a most active local correspondent and steward at the various annual festivals.

ON the occasion of the distribution of prizes at the Royal Irish Academy of Music, February 26, at the "Antient Concert Rooms," an interesting performance was given by the pupils. About 1,200 persons were present, including the Countess Cowper and Lord O'Hagan. The Academy receives a grant of £300 per annum from the Government.

MR. F. C. ATKINSON, Mus. Bac., Cantab., Organist of Manningham Church, Bradford, has been appointed organist of Norwich Cathedral in place of Dr. Gladstone. Mr. Atkinson was one of the four selected for trial from upwards of fifty applicants, and was choirboy and afterwards assistant to the late Dr. Buck.

STERNDALÉ BENNETT'S sacred Cantata "The Woman of Samaria" will be sung as the anthem, at Westminster Abbey, on Ascension Day, at a Festival Service on behalf of the Clergy Orphan Schools. There will be a full orchestra, and Dr. Bridge will be the Conductor.

A PERFORMANCE of Dr. Hiller's Oratorio "The Destruction of Jerusalem," by Miss Holland's choir, was announced to take place on the 31st ult., at the Dilettante Club, for the benefit of St. John's Foundation School for Sons of Poor Clergy.

A FESTIVAL, in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund, is to be given in Bristol about the middle of June, the Dean and Chapter having granted the use of the Cathedral for the service.

ON Tuesday evening, the 8th ult., the Choir of St. Luke's Parish Church, Old Street, E.C., presented their Organist, Mr. C. W. Pearce, Mus. Bac., Cantab., F.C.O., with the hood, gown, and cap appertaining to his degree, which was recently conferred upon him at Cambridge.

THE annual performance of Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," in St. Paul's Cathedral, takes place on Tuesday in Holy Week, April 12, at 7 p.m. The excellent plan of leaving the Cathedral open after the usual afternoon service will, we understand, be adhered to.

WE are glad to learn that Her Majesty has recognised the merits of the Philharmonic Society in a signal manner by subscribing for a certain number of stalls for the entire series of Concerts for the current season.

MESSRS. F. BESSON AND Co. have received a telegram from the Melbourne Exhibition, announcing that the highest award has been conferred on them for patents and improvements in musical instruments.

A SUCCESSFUL performance of Dr. Sloman's "Supplication and Praise" was given by the Norwood Church Society in the large hall of the Royal Normal College, Upper Norwood, on the 22nd ult.

WE understand that Professor Niels W. Gade is engaged in composing a Cantata for the Birmingham Festival. The subject is the Greek myth of "Psyche," and the book has been written in German by Herr Lobedantz.

BEETHOVEN'S "Ruins of Athens" and Mozart's Motett "Deus Tibi" are announced for performance at the next concert of the Highbury Philharmonic Society.

A GRAND Military Service, with full orchestra, will be held at Westminster Abbey on May 12, with Dr. Bridge as Conductor.

THE University of Aberdeen has recently conferred the honorary degree of LL.D., on Sir Herbert Oakeley, Professor of Music at the Edinburgh University.

WE hear that Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus. B., has undertaken the editorship of the Orchestra.

THE marriage of Herr Henschel with Miss Lillian Bailey took place at Boston, U.S., on the 9th ult.

REVIEWS.

Franz Liszt, von L. Ramann. Erster Band. Die Jahre 1811, bis 1840. Leipzig, 1881. [Breitkopf und Härtel.]

No stronger evidence could be produced in proof of the enormous progress made in the domain of art-literature during the last few decades than the concern shown by modern men of genius and eminence as to who should write their biographies. Imagine Bach or Handel bequeathing to a friend the materials which might furnish a picture of their career! Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven showed themselves equally indifferent on the same score, leaving it to the future art-historian to collect and combine into a more or less imperfect portrait the scattered details of their individuality. Mozart, it is true, died prematurely, but Haydn lived to a good old age, and yet it is only in recent times that a biography worthy of the "Father of the Symphony" has been attempted. In these latter days, on the contrary, the artist who has risen into fame soon becomes conscious of the fact that already during his lifetime numerous pens hold themselves in readiness in order to provide the world with his literary portrait as soon as his career has come to a close. But a genuine art-biography requires, on the part of its author, a combination of various qualities such as are not frequently met with in the same person. He should possess the capacities of the historian and the psychologist, in addition to distinct artistic tendencies; he should, moreover, feel himself in perfect sympathy with the artist whose life he attempts to depict. Hence the modern artist who confides the necessary materials for such a work to one between whom and himself such an artistic rapport exists does a real service both to his own cause and that of the art, even though the other qualities required may not be equally coexistent in the person of his choice.

Franz Liszt has been peculiarly fortunate in this respect, for there can be no doubt that the maestro has himself largely supplied the information contained in the volume before us, more especially as regards the earlier parts thereof. Our admiration, however, is due to the author for the ability with which she has mastered and arranged the vast material which has been placed at her disposal, as well as for the sympathetic insight which she displays into the individuality of her hero and its gradual development. The author being a lady, the most strikingly successful portion of her work is perhaps her treatment of the tender years of the poet-composer, and her description of the rapid unfolding of the child's mind; it certainly contains the most, previously unknown, information. But her historical retrospects, her pictures of the social and artistic life surrounding her hero at different stages of his career are equally attractive, full of animation and effective grouping; the result of much historical research combined with an artistic hand, able to reproduce with plastic force the impressions of a past epoch of the art which the mind had received. To this latter category belongs the author's description of the fashionable Parisian world in whose salons Liszt and his much-loved friend Chopin were wont to display their friendly rivalry at the pianoforte before enraptured audiences; as well as her account of the not equally friendly contest, as far as party-spirit could render it so, carried on in the French capital between Liszt and Thalberg. Each of the pianists was upheld against the other as regards style of playing, by a numerous group of amateurs and artists whose device was "No surrender." Modern pianoforte-playing has decided the question at issue by adopting the style of, and naming its school after, Liszt. Regarding the fascination which from an early age the latter exercised upon his hearers we may quote the following characteristic passage: "He (then scarcely yet thirteen years old) had, during his first visit to London, been invited to a soirée, together with other artists. Arriving rather late, another pianist of note had already been performing that evening without, however, creating any marked impression. The young virtuoso was then requested to play, and seating himself at once before the instrument he called forth the raptures of all present. He had played from memory, the other with the music before him. Behind their fans, however, the ladies whispered to each other comparisons between the two virtuosos which were all in favour of Master Liszt. The friends of the other artist then attributed the cause to the dry and uninteresting character of the composition. While this conversation was proceeding, Signor Pasta, who was present, happened to glance at the music still lying on the desk, and became aware that both performances had been those of the same piece." The volume is divided into two books, the first of which is headed "Kinder und Knabenjahre" (Child and Boyhood), comprising the period from 1811 to 1827, giving an account of the parentage of the child, of his precocious talent, his studies under Ch. Czerny and Salieri at Vienna, his subsequent concert-tours, and first stays at Paris and London. The second book, bearing the superscription "Die Jahre der individuellen Entwicklung" (Years of Individual Development), brings the history of the artist's life down to the year 1840, including chapters on his important artistic associations with Paganini, Hector Berlioz, Chopin, and others in the French capital; his philosophical speculations and religious scruples; his fresh concert-tours, and his relations to the Countess d'Agoult. It would be useless to attempt by means of a few extracts to give an adequate idea of the masterly manner in which the author has succeeded in making the central figure of her biography stand out from a full but never overcrowded background. Enough has, however, already been said to draw the attention of amateurs to this interesting and instructive addition to musico-biographical literature. It need scarcely be added that in the second volume will be treated the most important artistic events of the master's life, since his creative activity as a composer, as manifested in his "Symphonic Poems," only dates from the period after 1840, with which year the present volume closes. The general get-up of the book is in every way worthy of the eminent Leipzig firm which publishes it.

The Language of the Flowers. Suite de Ballet, by Frederic H. Cowen. I. Pianoforte Solo. II. Pianoforte Duet. [Metzler and Co.]

It was a happy thought that led Mr. Cowen, in view of a series of orchestral concerts, to compose this work for the purpose of relief from the gravity of more serious things. In his most sanguine moments, it may be, he did not expect for the Suite de Ballet such a success as it met with. The little pieces were presented as trifles, but the public saw in them very much more than trifling talent. Charmed with their grace and fancy, amateurs became enthusiastic about them, and the result was not only a repetition performance, but two arrangements, one for pianoforte solo, another for pianoforte à quatre mains.

The Suite, we need hardly say, is called "The Language of the Flowers" because each piece aims to be a musical expression of that which a particular flower is supposed to signify. The idea is a pretty one, and lends no little charm to the music. A general motto is prefixed to the set:—

Youth that ne'er grows old,
Dwells with Nature and her flowers, and Beauty sleeps
In her most green recesses.

This furnishes the sentiment of the whole, and looking for an evolution of beauty, we pass to No 1, "Daisy," typical of innocence, and having as its motto Burns's well-known line: "Wee, modest, crimson tippit flower." This is an Allegretto scherzando in G major, 6-8, dainty and delicate as to theme, and accompanied for the most part by chords on the first, second, fourth, and fifth quavers in each bar. The style and character of the movement is decidedly uncommon, while the simple elegance of the subject harmonises with what we, perhaps, ought to call its "poetic basis." No. 2, "Lilac," expresses the first emotions of love, and is prefaced by the lines:

I dreamed that love
Should steal upon the heart like summer dawn, Soft, gradual.

A fragment of the "Daisy" theme preludes this number, and is followed by an Andante in F major, 3-4, having as its principal feature a two-part "song without words," most unpretending, yet, withal, most expressive. Once or twice the Andante rises to passion, and is very effective when at that altitude, but its general purport is subdued, not to say sad. The technical merit of the movement is considerable, one or two enharmonic transitions being especially happy; but an orchestra is needed to bring out the full charm of its structure, as well as to lend it the advantage of colour. No. 3, "Fern," deals with fascination:—

She's outwardly
... all that entrances,
Nor is it in our power to uncharm it.

We have here a Moderato in B flat, common time, well adapted by its light and tripping character for pianoforte use. The movement is singularly erratic and wilful, like some pretty child of wayward tendencies, spoiled by admiration. At first the short, detached phrases wander off into many keys, but they eventually combine into a light-some flow of sound that, when properly brought out, charms as does the tinkling fall of a tiny fountain jet into its basin. No. 4, "Columbine," expresses folly:—

Yet Folly ever has ...
... a trifling air.

The particular folly here suggested would seem to be that of a carnival, for the music leaps and rolls and tumbles about with a sort of lumbering recklessness quite true to the conventional merriment of such a season. The movement is a Presto in C major, 3-4 time. Following it comes a Gavotte, "Yellow Jasmine," typifying elegance and grace:—

We were charmed,
... for the beautiful was there Triumphant.

And the beautiful is here also beyond question. A more delightful thing of its kind modern music cannot show. It is a musical embodiment of the quaint and somewhat formal grace that characterised the dances of the "good old times." No wonder the audience at Mr. Cowen's concerts encored it as often as the chance was afforded them. Last of all comes the "Lily of the valley," indicating the return of happiness. This movement opens with a fragment of the Folly theme, and consists mainly of a pretty subject in waltz rhythm (E flat, 3-4), followed by a second subject in A flat, and relieved by a reference to the passionate episode in "First Emotions of Love." Developed at some length, the finale ends, with propriety and effect, a series of pieces the success of which will, we trust, induce Mr. Cowen to write others similar in character. Music that is pure and good, and also likely to be popular, cannot have too high an estimate set upon it.

The Great Musicians. Edited by F. Hueffer. Schubert. By H. F. Frost. Weber. By Sir Julius Benedict. [Sampson Low and Co.]

THE series of biographical sketches, now in course of publication by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington, has recently been increased by the volumes named above. Within the compass of such works we cannot expect more than an outline of the subjects on which they treat; but it is due both to Mr. Frost and Sir Julius Benedict to say that they have turned the space allowed them to good account, and presented as complete a record of their heroes' lives as circumstances allowed. The materials for a Schubert biography are not profusely scattered about, and Mr. Frost was obliged to draw with a liberal hand upon the very unsatisfactory work of Dr. Kreissle. He has, however, not neglected the few other available authorities, and his book is useful because giving Schubert's life-story succinctly and consecutively. At the end Mr. Frost makes some interesting observations on the music of Schubert, a catalogue of which is appended.

Sir Julius Benedict's life of Weber—dedicated by permission to the Queen—consists of his well-known and interesting lecture upon the master in an expanded form, and with considerable additions of new matter. It had long been felt that Sir Julius's lecture should be committed to the safe custody of print, since no one living could speak with more authority respecting a good deal of Weber's artistic career than his favourite pupil and friend. In its present book-form the lecture is very welcome, and will probably go down to posterity as a standard work within the range to which it is confined. Sir Julius has neglected nothing of importance in Weber's life, while the entire narrative is made attractive by great and, under the circumstances, surprising grace of style and purity of language. The appended catalogue of Weber's works is valuable to the English reader because containing translations of Otto Jahn's descriptive and critical observations upon each Opus. This alone is worth more than the price charged for the entire book.

The Watchword. Would you ask my heart?
Kings and Queens. The silent tide.
Four-part Songs. Words by Mary Mark-Lemon.

The Rhine-raft Song. The Song to Pan.
In April time.

Four-part Songs. Words by Frederick Enoch.
Composed by Ciro Pinsuti.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

SIGNOR PINSUTI has so long been known as a composer of some of the most artistic and refined vocal music that the publication of this group of Part-songs would need but little more than a record of the fact, with an assurance that they "fully sustain his reputation," were we not convinced that many in the list are (at least in dramatic feeling) far above anything he has yet written for a choir. "The Watchword" is a highly characteristic composition; for although simple in construction, it is a perfect little story; and, if well sung, could not fail to produce a powerful effect. The movement of the "armed men" out of the city gates, in the first verse, is exquisitely contrasted with the watchings of the "maidens true," in the next verse, which is in the tonic minor, both ending with the impassioned phrase "Each for himself, and Allah for all!" Then in the third and final verse the riding back of the thinned band of warriors, their broken lances telling of the past struggle, is deeply pathetic, the watchword again raised by the victors forming a fitting climax to a tale both the words and music of which are touched by a truly sympathetic hand. "Kings and Queens" has a bold and melodious theme, with a charming modulation, not only striking in itself, but thoroughly expressive of the words. The smooth writing of the vocal parts in this song may well be studied by those who wish to gain effect by legitimate means. "Would you ask my heart the reason?" is a tender setting of some tender words, the change to the tonic minor being a noticeable point, and the return to the major, with the plagal cadence at the conclusion of the song, showing that the composer writes not without due study of the poetry he undertakes to illustrate. A lovely melody—to which the triplet at the commencement of each line of the poetry gives a quaint character—makes the "Silent tide" one of the most attractive songs of the series to those who merely desire a calm and peaceful specimen of the purest four-part writing. The "Rhine-raft Song" has a bold theme, thoroughly in sympathy with the musical words of Mr. Enoch; a good point being gained by the answering of the voices on the burden of the song at the conclusion of each verse. The simplicity of the subject in the next composition, "In April time"—charmingly suggesting the fragrance and freshness of Spring flowers—will, no doubt, earn for it the popularity it merits; but the "Song to Pan" is full of power, and rendered by vocalists who can catch the true spirit of words and music would be certain to achieve a marked success. The varied character in this collection of Part-songs is remarkable, considering how simply and legitimately the composer has produced his effects; and we are certain that Choral Societies in search of novelty will cordially thank us for drawing attention to their merits.

Forget me not. English words by Madame San Martino Campobello. Music by Charles Dubois.

Chanson d'Amour. Mélodie par L. Denza (Ricordi.)

THE English translation of the original French verses by Alfred de Musset is exceedingly well adapted to the music of M. Charles Dubois in the first song on our list, and we cordially commend it to vocalists in search of novelty. The accompaniments are as quiet and subdued as the feeling of the words demand, and the harmonies always appropriate and sympathetic with the voice. Of the two songs by Denza we prefer the first, the verses of M. Fermi having received a musical setting as highly coloured as the impassioned poetry. A good effect is gained by the change from the minor key to the relative major; and true artistic feeling is shown in the accompaniments throughout. In the "Chanson d'Amour" the resolution to keep up the figure in the pianoforte part somewhat detracts from the effect of the song, the voice part indeed being a slave to the accompaniment. Much musicianlike work, however, is apparent in many parts of the composition; and a good vocalist united with a good pianist may make the piece highly successful.

Suite in E major for the Organ. Composed by Emile Bernard. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS work introduces to English amateurs a composer who is to most of them, probably, a stranger. The Suite, nevertheless, ranks as Opus 26 among M. Bernard's productions, and therefore claims attention as something more than the tentative effort of inexperience. It begins, after four bars à capriccio, with an Andante grazioso in E major, common time; smoothly flowing and melodious at the outset, but soon becoming (un poco animato) contrapuntal in character. The alternation of these two styles constitutes a leading feature, and the movement, well written throughout, can hardly miss an approving verdict. A Scherzo Caprice in A minor, 3-4 time, follows, and well justifies its name by the fancy and waywardness that mark it from beginning to end. There is method, however, even in its most eccentric moods, for, amid all changes of time, character, and treatment, the hand of the skilful musician remains obvious. By way of extreme contrast, the Suite ends with an Introduction and Fugue in E major. The Introduction is short and massive, and the Fugue, on a two-bar subject, somewhat extended and very animated. We cannot call it elaborate also, but the music shows facility, and flows with freedom, while being clear to transparency. As the Suite is not difficult in proportion to the interest it excites, organists on the watch for useful novelties may profitably have their attention directed to it.

The Standard Book of Song, for Temperance Meetings and Home Use. Arranged by T. Bowick. Musical Editor, James A. Birch, Gentleman of H.M. Chapels Royal.

[National Temperance Publication Depot, Strand.]

THE advocates of the Temperance movement do not appear to be able to further their views without the aid of music. This, of course, there can be no objection to; but as assuredly commonplace words set to melodies by the best composers can only bring ridicule upon the movement, we have always freely stated our objection to such effusions whenever they have been brought before us. Our readers may remember that to some of the finest melodies of Mozart we have had nonsense verses in praise of Temperance drinks forwarded to us for review; and we have little doubt that some of the extracts from these compositions, which we then gave, would make all who perused them turn with horror from the book, if not from the cause it advocated. We have pleasure, however, in being able conscientiously to say that the volume before us is in every respect a contrast to the works on this subject which have from time to time reached us. In the preface we are told that "the book contains upwards of sixty original compositions, and about fifty new arrangements; and also that a number of the tunes are comparatively new, having been previously issued in books only but little known." The work is arranged to supply the need of all assemblies where song is used, "sacred, temperance, public, and private gatherings, and the home circle," it is said, having been catered for. A careful perusal of the contents of the volume has convinced us that in every respect the design of the editors has been most satisfactorily carried out. The contents are divided into "Temperance Songs," "Moral Songs," "Sacred Songs," and "Anthems"; and we are glad to find that the selection of poetry is not limited to the writings of those who are identified with the Temperance cause, for "wherever," the arranger tells us, "a piece of sufficient merit has appeared, and which has seemed to us to be in harmony with our principles, it has been gladly appropriated." This is as it should be, and the result, of course, is that, although some trifling verses have been admitted, the majority of the little poems are such as intelligent persons may sing and listen to. The music, too, is generally well chosen and excellently arranged throughout: it is true that a slight shock to our artistic feeling cannot be controlled when we find such a line as "Strike the iron while it's hot," set to a melody by Mendelssohn: but these instances are few and far between, and on the whole we must give much praise for the manner in which the music and words are united. The book is carefully printed, and an elegantly designed cover renders it an appropriate volume for the drawing-room table.

There is dew for the flow'ret. Poetry by Thomas Hood. Composed by Eaton Faning. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. FANING is rapidly making his way as a composer of part-music, his characteristic "Song of the Vikings" having sprung into popularity very soon after its first public performance. The composition now before us shows that he can write with equal effect in another vein, for not only the refined and poetical thought in the music with which he has coloured the verses of Hood, but the contrapuntal power displayed in the treatment of the vocal parts are equally deserving of warm commendation. The modulations are extremely beautiful, and always appropriate to the words. We are especially pleased with the concluding four bars, the chromatic harmonies in the inner parts giving an eloquence to the burden of the song which cannot fail to strike every listener. A well-trained choir will be certain to create a marked effect with this thoughtful little musical poem.

Prelude and Gigue for the Pianoforte. Dedicated to Miss Macirone by her affectionate friend, Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew. [Duncan Davison and Co.]

WE are glad to find Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew helping forward the cause of healthy musical education by contributing her share to the store of modern pianoforte works which reflect rather the solidity of the past than the shallowness of the present age. The Prelude and Gigue now before us—the first in A major and the second in A minor—are excellent specimens of that style of writing to which so many of the standard composers occasionally devoted their talents; and we cordially commend them to the attention both of performers and teachers. The Gigue is just as melodious and lively as such a piece should be; and the modulations throughout are appropriate and effective. The composer will thank us for pointing out the omission of a flat before the first B in the treble—last bar, third line—which is indeed more important than the natural which is placed before the F.

Tom he was a piper's son. Cheerful Glee for Four Male Voices.

Come, follow me (Queen Mab's Song). Glee for Men's Voices. Words by Shakespeare.

Composed by E. Townshend Driffield.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. DRIFFIELD appears to have a very decided talent for part-song writing, if we may judge from the two specimens forwarded to us; for, although very opposite in character, they are remarkable for a musical realisation of the true spirit of the words. Excellent indeed is the effect of the tonic pedal upon which the opening phrases of "Tom he was a piper's son" are sung; and the consequences resulting from his performance of "Over the hills and far away" are so graphically and artistically coloured as to form a piece of genuine musical humour far in advance of many more ambitious attempts which have come before us. The change into 6-8 time is exceedingly happy; and in the concluding portion of the song the solemn phrase given out by the two basses in unison is irresistibly comic. In "Queen Mab's Song" the composer has thoroughly caught the spirit of Shakespeare, and evidenced a dramatic power which practice may still further develop. The solos for first bass, tenor, and alto, accompanied with closed lips by the choir, have an excellent effect; and the holding notes to the words "Home to bed" lead well to the repetition of the original theme. If this composer (whose name is new to us) is desirous of ascertaining his true artistic position before proceeding further, we can unhesitatingly assure him that he may very safely continue in the path he has chosen.

Because of thee. Song. Words by F. E. Weatherly. Composed by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. TOURS has succeeded in writing an impassioned love-song which, though published in a lower key, is evidently intended for a tenor. The opening phrases, in F minor, are deeply sympathetic with the poetry; and although, after the tonic major, the original key is not returned to, this non-conventional form strikes us as infinitely more spontaneous than the sensational alternate bursts of minor and major which characterise so many of the modern vocal effusions. The accompaniment throughout is full of interest; and amongst many beautiful points, we may mention the echo of the phrases "Come to thee," towards the conclusion of the song, which effectively intensifies the eloquence of the music. The composer has given us many vocal pieces, but never one more instinct with true poetical feeling.

Le Rendezvous. Song. Words by Alice Dumont. Composed by C. G. Maclean. (Novello, Ewer and Co.)

A VERY smoothly written song in C sharp minor and E major. The theme, although not striking, is vocal and melodious, and the accompaniment (perhaps somewhat wanting in character) helps, without disturbing, the voice. Let not the composer however be deluded into the belief that every amateur will play A♯ in the bar before the 6-8 time occurs. The natural should be marked for the benefit of those who have neither ears nor knowledge.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D. By Charles E. Tinney. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS will be found a very effective setting of the Canticles for Festival use—not too long, and by no means difficult. The composer is a member of the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, and his work has more than once received an excellent rendering inside the walls of that church. It certainly deserved this compliment, for it is bright and spontaneous, and exhibits an admirable power of reflecting the force of the words. Mr. Tinney has not only made a most useful addition to the literature of genuine "Festal" settings of these Canticles, but, what is better still, has proved that he has a facility for composition in the modern Church style; and we cannot but hope that this is only an instalment of many good works to come.

Thema in C moll; mit Variationen in drei Sätzen, für Pianoforte. Componirt von Arthur O'Leary.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THAT a simple subject can be employed as the groundwork of some very high-class art-work for the pianoforte has been successfully shown by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and many others; and we are glad to find that our English creative artists are beginning to prove that the flimsy variations so extensively patronised by the "showy" pianists in this country do not entirely represent the work of native composers in this class of writing. That Mr. O'Leary should, during his intercourse with Mendelssohn at the Leipzig Conservatoire, have caught the feeling and style of the composer is scarcely to be wondered at; but we are convinced that could the great master have seen the variations now before us, he would have been extremely gratified. The unpretending theme upon which this composition is built is admirably suited for the purpose; and the contrast of style in the several variations sufficiently evidences that the composer has written upon a defined plan. Although the piece appeals only to accomplished players, the effects are all legitimately gained: there is no straining after sensational feats, and no grim chords and astounding modulations disturb the equanimity of the listener; the passages unquestionably demand a perfect command of the instrument; but they all lie well under the hand, and require only calm practice and earnest attention. Conscientiously we recommend this piece, both for study and performance, to those players who feel that they can do justice to its merits.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AFTER having made the round of the majority of leading operatic stages in Germany, Richard Wagner's "Nibelungen" Tetralogy is at last to be performed next month in the capital; not, indeed, at the Royal Opera house, but at the Victoria Theatre, under the direction of Angelo Neumann, and under the auspices of the poet-composer's personal presence. The orchestral body will consist of the members of the well-known Symphonie-capelle, reinforced by the orchestra of the Leipzig Stadt-Theater. Mesdames Friedrich-Materna, Vogl, Reicher-Kindermann, Riegler, Sachse-Hofmeister, and Herren Jäger and Vogl are among the principal vocalists engaged in the performances, which will consist of four representations of the entire work, taking place between the days of May 5-8, 12-16, 18-22, and 25-29, respectively.

Franz Liszt is shortly expected at Berlin in order to direct the performance by the Cäcilien Verein of his oratorio "Christus." Dr. von Bülow's arrival at the Prussian capital is likewise announced about the same time, when a Liszt Concert is to be given by the eminent pianist, on the 27th inst., in anticipation of the approaching seventieth anniversary of the birth of the composer of the "Symphonic-poems." As the "Nibelungen" performances are to take place shortly afterwards, it is more than probable that the three leading representatives of the "Music of the Future" will be, for once, assembled in the great northern emporium.

The only authentic portrait of Franz Schubert, a water-colour drawing, by the painter Rieder, has just been sold by auction at Vienna for the sum of 1205 florins (about £100). It was painted in the year 1825, three years before the composer's death, and upon it all existing representations of his likeness are based. The portrait which, from an artistic point of view, is said to possess but indifferent merit, has been acquired for the above sum by a Viennese amateur, Dr. Gravitsch.

Boito's opera, "Mefistofele," is in course of preparation at the Hof-Theater, Weimar. The same work was recently produced, for the first time, at the Stadt-Theater, Cologne.

Dr. von Bülow's eminent capacity and consequent predilection for playing, and even conducting, from memory, has, the Signale assures us, led him to arouse a similar ambition amongst the members of his orchestra of Meiningen. The time is not yet, but another year, and the zealous and original-minded artist thinks the thing will be accomplished, without the aid even of a prompter. The pianist-conductor will then marshal his forces to Leipzig, and there give a series of Orchestral Beethoven Concerts at the Gewandhaus, all leaving their music-books behind at Meiningen. There is confidence, no doubt, in the capabilities of a body of artists such as the Weimar theatre can boast to accomplish the task; but then, Cui bono? Such an innovation would appear to be more calculated to strike the eye than the ear. For where the orchestra is invisible, as instituted (with excellent reasons, we think) by Richard Wagner, who cares to know whether the musicians are playing from memory or not? Meanwhile Dr. von Bülow's intended innovation will certainly tax to their utmost degree the individual capacities of his orchestra, and the experiment, whenever it may be made, should be judged by the result.

The following letter, addressed by Liszt to a friend (Herr Pázmándy), has been published in the Gazette de Hongrie :—

Dear Sir and Friend,—You desire to know what impression the Bülow Concert of yesterday has made upon me. He belongs to you, to all of us, to the whole of the intelligent public of Europe. To express it in two words: Admiration, enthusiasm. Twenty-five years ago Bülow was my disciple in music, just as twenty-five years before that time I was the disciple of my dear and highly esteemed master, Czerny. But it is given to Bülow to strive more effectively and more persistently than myself. His admirable Beethoven edition is dedicated to me as the "Fruit of my Instructions." But it was the instructor himself who had here to learn from the pupil, and Bülow continues on his part to instruct the world—as much by his astonishing mastery at the pianoforte as by his extraordinary musical proficiency, and now again by his inimitable conductorship of the Meiningen Capelle—there you have the musical progress of our time.—Cordially yours,

F. Liszt.

Budapest, February 15, 1881.

The letter just quoted reflects as much honour upon the writer himself, as it intends to bestow upon the eminent musician who forms the subject of it.

Ferdinand Hiller has proceeded to Barcelona, where he will conduct a series of concerts of the Philharmonic Society of that town.

The first few numbers of a new music journal entitled La Renaissance Musicale have just been published in Paris under the auspices of M. Edouard Hippéau as chief editor, and MM. Reyer, Massenet, Joncières, Schuré, Fourcad, and Lacomme as leading contributors. The new journal intends to represent the interests of "young France" in matters musical, and avows, in its opening number, the influence exercised upon that school by modern Germany. M. Camille Saint-Saëns, the newly elected academicien, however, whose name had been included amongst the list of contributors, took umbrage at this admission and, in a letter to the editor, wherein he resigns his connection with the journal, he says, inter alia: "Richard Wagner has conquered the world, but France remains inaccessible to him. He is inconsolable about this, and I can comprehend his feelings. The Germans are most anxious in order to win over the French to their cause at last. Let them try, but do not think that I shall lend my assistance in the matter. I will support, as much as you like, Wagner against Brahms, or Wagner against Verdi; but Germany against France, never." Art and politics, lovers of music will ask, what have the two in common with each other? But "things are managed differently in France."

M. Gounod's already much talked of new opera "Le Tribut de Zamora" was announced to be performed for the first time at the Paris Opéra on the 30th ult. For some time past numerous rehearsals of the work have taken place under the supervision of the composer, who has been at great pains to revise and amplify his score wherever he deemed it necessary. The following is the cast as announced in "Le Ménestrel": Hermosa, Madame Krauss; Xaima, Madame Daram; Iglésia, Madame Janvier; Manuel Diaz, M. Sellier; Ben Saïd, M. Lasalle; Hadjar, M. Melchissédéc; Ramire II., M. Giraudet; Le Cadi, M. Sapin, &c. The composer will personally conduct the first three representations of his work, after which M.

Altès will wield the bâton of chef d'orchestre. Immense pains have been bestowed upon the perfection of the scenic arrangements of the piece. The demand for tickets for the first performances has been enormous, and there is every probability of the new work by the composer of "Faust" becoming the great success, at all events financially, of the season at the National establishment.

An opera by R. Emmerich, entitled "Van Dyck," was recently performed for the first time at the Stuttgart Hof-Theater, on the occasion of the anniversary of the birth of the King of Wurtemberg. The new work of the talented composer was very well received.

At St. Petersburg, Tchaikowsky's opera "The Maid of Orleans" met with great success at the Imperial Theatre.

Our valued contributor, Dr. L. Nohl, has just been elected Professor Extraordinary of Musical History to the University of Heidelberg, where his lectures on the same subject have long since met with much appreciation.

A monument is to be erected at Darmstadt to Abbé Vogler, the musical theorist and composer, who numbered amongst his pupils C. M. von Weber and Meyerbeer, and who for many years previous to his death, in 1814, had been one of the most prominent figures in the society of that town.

At the San Carlo Theatre at Naples, Wagner's "Lohengrin" was produced for the first time on February 26, amidst the display of much enthusiasm on the part of a crowded audience. Regarding the performance itself, a correspondent of the Daily News says: "Taking all in all, Naples may well be proud this year of the singers, and especially of the instrumentalists of her Grand Opera house, who have been able to execute in so worthy a manner a most difficult composition."

Regarding the same opera, a correspondent of the Times writes, under date 27th ult., from Paris: "A telegram from Madrid announces that 'Lohengrin' was given there on the 25th inst. for the first time. The public was at first very cold, but warmed as the piece proceeded, and before the end the singers had been called on the stage as many as ten times. The scenery was magnificent, and the performance excellent."

At the Grand Théâtre, Nice, on February 14, the new opera by the Count d'Osmond, entitled "Le Partisan," was performed for the first time, and met with a most enthusiastic reception, all the artists engaged (including Mdle. Smeroschi, a powerful soprano) being frequently recalled. The performances following the first representation were equally successful.

We have to record the death of Nicholas Rubinstein, the younger brother of Anton, and himself a pianist of considerable attainments. He had been for years the Director of the Moscow Conservatoire.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Conservatoire (February 27): "Roméo et Juliette," symphonie dramatique (Berlioz); Violin Concerto (Mendelssohn); Motet for double chorus (Bach); Overture, "Fidelio" (Beethoven). Concert Populaire (February 27): First and second parts of "Le Désert" (F. David); "Phaëton," poème symphonique (Saint-Saëns); Largo for violoncello (Boccherini); Papillon for violoncello (Popper); Marche funèbre d'une Marionnette (Gounod); Sérénade et Allegro giocoso for pianoforte (Mendelssohn); Nocturne et Gavotte for violoncello (Popper); Overture, "Freischütz" (Weber). Concert Populaire (March 6 and 13): "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz). Châtelet Concert (March 6 and 13): "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz). Conservatoire (March 20): Choral Symphony (Beethoven); Passacaille from "Armida" (Lulli); "La prière du matin et du soir" (Emilio del Cavaliere); Overture, "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn). Concert Populaire (March 20): Symphony, D major (Beethoven); "Variations sur un air Béarnais" (Octave Fouque); Pianoforte Concerto (Liszt); Fragments from "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn); Tarantelle from "La Muette" (Auber); March from "Lohengrin" (Wagner). Châtelet Concert (March 20): "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz).

Leipzig.—Conservatorium (February 25): Trio, D minor (Schumann); Fantasie-Stücke (Schumann); Violin Sonata, G major (Beethoven); Adagio, for forty-three violins (Fiorello); Moto perpetuo, for ten violins unisono (Paganini). Conservatorium (March 4): Quartet, F major (Schumann); Pianoforte Concerto, A minor (Schumann); Violin Sonata, F major (Beethoven); Introduction and Fugue from Violin Sonata (Rust).

Munich.—Musikalische Akademie (March 9): Military Symphony (Haydn); Violin Concerto, No. 9 (Spohr); Symphony, C minor (Beethoven). Musikalische Akademie (March 18): Sérénade for Orchestra (Mozart); Liederkreis, "Trompeter von Säckingen" (H. Vogl); Symphony, "Harold in Italy" (Berlioz).

* Contributions intended for this column should indicate clearly the place and date of performance, as otherwise they cannot be inserted.

Cologne.—Concert Gesellschaft (March 15): Overture, "Leonore," No. 3 (Beethoven); Air from "Taming of the Shrew" (Goetz); Violoncello Concerto (Haydn); Fantasia for Violoncello (Servais); Finale from "Loreley" (Mendelssohn); Symphony, C minor (Brahms).

Wiesbaden.—Cur Orchester Concerts (February 25): Symphony, E flat major (Haydn); "Burns," second Scotch Rhapsody (Mackenzie); Overture, Scherzo, and Finale (Schumann). March 4: Serenade, No. 3, for Orchestra (Volkmann); "Orpheus," Symphonic Poem (Liszt); Symphony, "In the Forest" (Raff). March 18: Symphony, B flat major (Möhring); Suite No. 2 (F. Lachner).

Baden-Baden.—Cur Orchester Concerts (March 4): Symphony, F major (Beethoven); Air from "Oberon" (Weber); Fourth Pianoforte Concerto (Rubinstein); Pianoforte Pieces (Chopin, Liszt); Overture, "Les Francs Juges" (Berlioz). March 9: Symphonie Dramatique (Rubinstein); Violoncello Concerto (Saint-Saëns); "Tasso," Symphonic Poem (Liszt); Overture, "Les Francs Juges" (Berlioz).

Turin.—Stefano Tempia Choral Society (March —): "Crucifixus" (Palestrina); 10th Psalm (Marcello); "La Vergine di Sumam" (L. Bellardi); "Gallia" (Gounod); Chorus from "L'Elisir d'Amore" (Donizetti); 136th Psalm (Gounod).

Baltimore.—Peabody Concert (February 12): Symphony, No. 4 (Beethoven); Suite, E flat major (Raff); Songs (Schubert); Overture, "Les Francs Juges" (Berlioz). Peabody Concert (February 26): Overture, "Egmont" (Beethoven); Songs (Rubinstein); Norse Suite (Hamerik).

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHURCH ORATORIO AND HIGHER CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Nothing so effectually strengthens the hands and cheers the heart in true work as the sympathy and interest of fellow-workers. Can you grant me a few lines of your precious space to try and win this sympathy and interest in the musical work that we have set ourselves to do in these northern parts?

Experience in choral organisation proves the exceeding difficulty—I may say utter impossibility—of keeping up the interest of the singers in the usual style of choral festival in which are associated in one and the same service good, bad, and indifferent choirs. The fact is the better choirs grow wearied and disheartened at the heavy and thankless task of dragging on their weaker brethren, and the worse grow dissatisfied at being constantly taken out of their depth by music they know has been set for the purpose of keeping the better singers in good humour. Sooner or later, if the association of choirs is not to die out altogether, the needs and requirements of the better and the worse must be separately considered and separately met. This year, in our district, we are attempting this double work. While the ordinary Choral Association is looking after the smaller country choirs, the Deans of the three north-east cathedrals of York, Durham, and Ripon have invited the larger and more efficient surpliced choirs of the three dioceses to join their three cathedral choirs in a grand festival service to be held in York Minster, on July 7. The helpful brightness and refinement of the female voice will be secured by placing efficient sopranos and contraltos on the front rows of the congregation's seats. The service is to be "the shortened Service," and for the Anthem the Church Oratorio "St. John the Evangelist," specially written by Dr. Armes, of Durham, for this festival, with organ accompaniment and solos fit for cathedral principals. The cost of books and the expenses of the festival day it is expected will be recouped by collections after services in various local centres, at which the festival work will be repeated by such members of the festival choir as can be brought together. And afterwards each choir that has joined will find itself perfect in a work that will prove itself a very mine of anthems, for there is not a bar of "St. John the Evangelist" that is not sound choral writing.

Will not one who reads these words help our work by taking up the same work in their own district?

Yours truly,

Bilbrough, York.

KÜHNE'S "GRAMMAR OF MUSIC."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have read with interest the review on my "Grammar of Music" in your March issue, and wish to express my obligations to your critic for the candid statement of his views. His objections, however, to the use of fractional names can scarcely hold ground if we consider the custom of indicating the time by means of a fraction at the commencement of a movement. It need hardly be said that this fact induced me originally to adopt the system referred to. The natural way of marking a piece in $\frac{6}{8}$ time would be ♩ (or six quavers); instead of which, however, a fraction is used. I should much like to know how your reviewer would make this clear to a beginner. Suggestions of this kind might form a most fertile subject for discussion at a meeting of English music-masters, if such were attainable.

As to the question of the "Preparation of Dissonant Chords," I purposely avoided troubling amateurs with the "secondary sevenths." I should certainly like to make use of your reviewer's hint by putting this paragraph in a clearer form, if possible, in a future edition. The fact of my applying the term "preparation" to the foundation-note, instead of "connecting-link," has evidently caused a misunderstanding.

In spite of the attempt at originality in my "Grammar," I beg you not to consider me blind to the value of old traditions. On the contrary, I strongly disapprove of complications frequently found in modern works—complications which, to my mind, too often disguise poverty under the cloak of dazzling glitter.

Apologising for thus trespassing on your valuable space,

I remain, sir, your faithful servant,

Yarlet, Stafford, March 20, 1881. CARL T. KÜHNE.

[We are glad to find that Herr Kühne intends to profit by our hint and put his paragraph respecting the preparation of discords in a "clearer form." We need scarcely say that we quite agree with him that the method of marking our time is absurd; but not more so than many other things which we would willingly attempt to reform were we to publish a book to teach what the notation of music ought to be, instead of what it is.—The Writer of the Notice.]

THE ORGAN PEDAL-BOARD.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In your number for February it was announced that a Conference of organ-builders and organists is now being held by the College of Organists, for the purpose of securing greater uniformity in the construction of organs, especially the arrangements at the keys. At the meeting which took place on February 3, the chief subject for consideration was the formation and position of the pedal-board; but it was so hurriedly disposed of, that I feel tempted to trouble you with a few lines, in the hope of eliciting the opinions of some of your numerous readers.

The few persons who spoke on the occasion seemed in favour of retaining the straight pedal-board, and fixing the middle C under C of the manuals, an arrangement which, in my opinion, is open to much objection. They did not advance any arguments in its favour beyond their individual preferences, or prove either that it was theoretically right or most convenient for the generality of players.

About thirty years ago or more, when organ pedals rarely exceeded two octaves, and the manuals never went above F, a straight pedal-board, fixed C under C, answered the purpose fairly well; but now that pedals are uniformly made up to F, two and a half octaves, and manuals carried up to A, and even C, I maintain that it is an absolute necessity, if an organist is to have proper control over his instrument, and fully display its resources, that he should place himself in the centre both of manuals and pedals, and not in front of so-called "middle C." Even then he will not be able to reach from one extremity of the pedals to the other without shifting his body, I maintain, unless the pedal-board be made both slightly radiating and concave. It is for the College of Organists to settle what the amount of concavity and radiation should be, but to go back to the old-fashioned straight pedals would be a retrograde movement quite unworthy, I consider, of a public body which ought to take the lead in encouraging all modern improvements.

I await the opinions of some of your more experienced contributors, and remain, sir, yours faithfully,

ALEX. S. COOPER, F.C.O., &c.

Brompton Square, S.W.

ORGAN CONSTRUCTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—May I be allowed a remark or two upon this subject, in reference to the report contained in your February number?

First, The arrangement of draw stops.—The present arrangement has a certain scientific appearance, for usually the deepest and loudest-sounding stops of each manual appear at the bottom of their fellows: i. e., bourdons below 8 ft. stops; open diapasons and gambas below stop diapasons and dulcianas. But, if the player's convenience is to be considered, should not this be altered? In producing a crescendo or diminuendo the bourdons and open diapasons, the mixtures and reeds, are not the first to be drawn nor the last to be taken off; and yet if the performer begins at one end of his draw-stop jamb and works to the other, as he would naturally like to do, this is the order he must draw or put them in. Why not arrange from the bottom as follows: (1) soft 8 ft. stops; (2) loud 8 ft. stops; (3) soft 4 ft. stops; (4) loud 4 ft. stops; (5) 16 ft. stops; (6) 2 ft. and mixtures; (7) reeds. This arrangement destroys, it is true, the apparent order of the harmonic position of the stops in the column of sound, which the present arrangement seems to suggest, but for practical convenience it would, I venture to think, be a great gain.

Second, Transposing Organs.—Why should not the key-boards of our organs be made moveable, four pipes added at each end of the register, and so the whole organ made capable of transposing music a minor third higher or lower? I once saw a transposing harmonium on this principle, and I have often wondered why the idea was never introduced into pianos; and, though the mechanical difficulties in organs would be very much greater, I think they are by no means insuperable. To raise the organ pitch when a band was united with it would be an obvious gain; to lower the pitch when the choir was small, or the music outrageously high, would be equally an advantage.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERDEEN.—At the Concert given by the members of the University Choral Society on the 4th ult., the programme was composed mainly of solos and glees. The rendering of the various items was more successful than had been expected, and in particular the preparation of the choruses evidenced hard work and no small amount of energy expended by the enthusiastic Conductor, Herr Meid. The second part was opened by a very fine performance on the organ by Sir Herbert Oakeley, the overture to Handel's Orho, which was treated in a very masterly style; and, in response to an enthusiastic encore, Sir Herbert played an air from Sebastian Bach's Cantata Mein gläubiges Herz; a Whitsuntide Theme. This was followed by the Studenten Lied (arranged for male voices by Sir Herbert Oakeley) "Gaudeamus," which was given with the usual feeling and spirit. Some of the pieces were accompanied on the organ by Sir Herbert, and by Messrs. Morrison and Hird on the pianoforte. Mr. Morrison also played the accompaniments to the various solos. Before the singing of the National Anthem, Professor Struthers, honorary president of the University Choral Society, thanked Sir Herbert Oakeley for his kindness in being present and assisting at their University Concert.

ABERGELE.—The Philharmonic Society gave its first Concert of the season on February 24, when Haydn's Creation was performed.

Miss Jessie Royd, Mr. J. M. Powell (St. Asaph Cathedral), and Mr. T. Brandon, were the principal vocalists. Rev. W. Morton (Succentor of St. Asaph Cathedral) presided at the harmonium, and Miss J. Evans at the pianoforte. The orchestra was led by Mr. Stephenson. The choruses were well rendered, and the whole performance gave universal satisfaction to a crowded audience. Mr. Felix C. Watkins conducted.

ACCRINGTON.—The first Concert by the members of the Vocal Union, was given on Wednesday, the 16th ult., in the Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. Tattersall. The singing was exceedingly creditable to all concerned. The programme consisted of Sterndale Bennett's May Queen and a miscellaneous selection. Mr. Tattersall conducted and also accompanied. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Barlow, Miss Tasker, Miss Greenwood, Miss Christie, and Messrs. Whittam, Christie, Hopkinson, Macfarlane, and Grisdale. A feature of the evening was the playing of Mr. Tattersall on the harmonium and pianoforte, his pianoforte solos being brilliantly executed. A. C. Mackenzie's humorous glee, "A Franklyn's Dogge," was excellently sung by Messrs. Whittam, Bury, Christie, Macfarlane, Gardner Hopkinson, and Haworth.

BANFF.—On Friday evening, the 4th ult., a Concert was given in the County Hall, on behalf of the funds of the Banff Dispensary. The Concert was projected by Herr Hoffmann, who made the entire musical arrangements, with the cordial co-operation of ladies and gentlemen in the burgh; and as the tickets for the Concert on Friday were all disposed of before the demand was satisfied, a second Concert took place on Saturday, in aid of the funds of the Soup Kitchen. The programme at each of these Concerts was highly interesting; the vocalists were cordially received, and the pianoforte solos of Herr Hoffmann were an especial feature in the selection. Before the close of the proceedings the Rev. J. W. Geddie warmly thanked all who had taken part in the performance, and paid a well-merited compliment to Herr Hoffmann, not only for the trouble he had taken in organising these Concerts, but for the zeal he had always shown in his endeavour to raise the standard of musical taste in the district.

BEDFORD.—On Tuesday evening, the 1st ult., the Musical Society gave, at the opening Concert of their fifteenth season, Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria, the solo parts being sung by Madame Cross-Lavers, Miss Coyte Turner, Mr. Hanson, and Mr. Henry Cross. The work was excellently performed, the popular number "God is a spirit" receiving the usual encore. The second part included Mendelssohn's hymn Hear my Prayer; and two movements, (the first movement and the andante con moto) from Beethoven's C minor Symphony were so admirably rendered as to make all lovers of instrumental music hope that the complete symphony may soon find a place in the programme of the Society. Mr. Diemer conducted with his usual tact and skill.

BELFAST.—The third subscription Concert of the present season of the Philharmonic Society took place on the 1st ult., in the Ulster Hall, and was largely attended. The Cantata with which the Concert opened was Dr. F. Hiller's Song of Victory. The performance of the work was somewhat unequal, the orchestra being incomplete and wanting in balance of tone, but the solo parts and the choruses were executed in a finished manner. The solos were taken by Miss Anna Williams. The other vocalists were Madame Trebelli, Mr. Frank Boyle, and Mr. Frederick King. Herr Adolf Beyschlag conducted with his customary ability, and also discharged the duties of accompanist.

BELPER.—On Thursday, February 24, the Choral Society gave a successful Concert, consisting of Bennett's May Queen, with a miscellaneous selection. The Cantata was well received, the attack and precision of the choir being the most noticeable feature in the performance. The vocalists belonging to the society, Miss A. Hey, Mr. Neaun, and Mr. Terry, were ably supplemented by Miss Honeybone, of Nottingham. The Conductor was Mr. A. W. W. Vane Palmer.

BIRKENHEAD.—The choral section of the 2nd Cheshire Rifle Volunteers gave a Concert on the 24th ult., at the Music Hall, in aid of the Ladies' Charitable Institution. Amidst other successes of the evening, not the least was that of a cheerful glee, upon the subject of "Tom, the piper's son," composed expressly for the occasion by Mr. E. T. Driffield.

BIRMINGHAM.—Miss Melville gave a Ballad Concert in the Town Hall on Thursday, February 24, assisted by Miss Lena Law, Signors Fabrini and Foli, vocalists; Miss Frances Thomas, clarinet; and Mr. F. Cliffe, pianoforte. The following evening, in the same hall, Mr. Charles Lunn gave a Pupil Concert, when some capital singing was given by vocalists of promise. Mr. S. S. Stratton's fifth popular Chamber Concert was given in the Masonic Hall on Tuesday, the 1st ult. The programme comprised Mendelssohn's Posthumous String Quartet in E flat, the late Henry Westrop's Pianoforte Quartet, Op. 2; the Sonata in G (Op. 13), for pianoforte and violin, by Grieg; and a Salontück for pianoforte and violoncello, by Rubinstein. Mr. C. J. Duchemin was the pianist, and gave, in addition to the concerted pieces, a masterly rendering of Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 101. Mr. Ward was the violinist in Grieg's Sonata, and leader of the Quartet; and Mr. J. Owen played a piece by Rubinstein. The last of Messrs. Harrison's popular Concerts took place in the Town Hall on Monday, the 7th ult. The great attraction was the band of Mr. Charles Hallé, and Madame Neruda as violinist. The programme included Schumann's Rhénish Symphony (first time in Birmingham); the Overture, Lodoiska (Cherubini); the Hungarian March from Faust (Berlioz); and the second Rhapsodie Norvégienne (Svendsen). Madame Neruda played Spohr's Violin Concerto in A (No. 12); and Mr. Hallé gave a fine rendering of Weber's Concertstück. The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Antoinette Sterling, and Mr. Edward Lloyd. The Concert was throughout of the highest excellence. The Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union's annual Concert was given in the Masonic Hall on Wednesday, the 9th ult. The programme comprised Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5; the Allegro Vivace, from Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony; the Overtures, Masaniello and William Tell, and three pieces arranged by the Conductor. Vocal selections were well rendered by Miss Young and Mr. W. Lee Mathews. The Concert reflected the highest credit upon the talented and indefatigable honorary Conductor, Mr. C. J. Duchemin.—Miss Alice Sydney Burvett, the Australian pianist, gave a Recital in the Masonic Hall on Tuesday, the 22nd ult. The programme included Beethoven's Waldstein Sonata, and pieces by Chopin, Mendelssohn, Field, Raff, Gottschalk, and others. The young lady possesses executive powers of no mean order, but appears to greater advantage in bravura pieces, than in those of the classical school.

BLAIRGOWRIE.—On Tuesday evening, the 15th ult., the Tonic Sol-fa Musical Society gave a Concert in the Public Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of a selection of choruses from Mozart's Twelfth Mass, and the second of part-songs. The vocal parts were, on the whole, fairly sustained by the Society. In the second part, Mr. A. Bain gave two songs, "The white squall" and "To her I love," the latter by Mr. H. Dryerre, the Conductor of the Society. The accompaniments were rendered by a few members of the Orchestral Society, with the assistance of Miss Robertson at the harmonium. Mr. H. Dryerre proved an efficient Conductor.

BRADFORD.—The sixth and last subscription Concert of the season was given in St. George's Hall on Friday evening, the 11th ult., when Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and Rossini's Stabat Mater were performed. The solo vocalists were Mdlle. Breidenstein, Madame Mary Cummings, Miss Tomlinson; Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Barrington Foote. The choruses were capitally sung throughout, and the band was faultless. Mr. Clough presided at the organ and lent efficient aid to the choruses. The whole of the musical forces were kept thoroughly under control by Mr. Hallé, who conducted with great judgment.

BRIGHTON.—At Mr. Watts's Ballad Concert on Thursday, February 24, the solo vocalists were the Misses Robertson, Mdlle. Minnie Hauk, Miss Thorndike, Miss Jessica O'Brien, Mr. Herbert Reeves, and Mr. Barrington Foote; the accompanists were Mr. Kingsbury, Mr. Henry Parker, and Mr. Lindsay Sloper. Mr. Watts's Philharmonic Choir sang Randegger's "Praise the Lord," and the part-songs, Reay's "Dawn of day" and Mendelssohn's "Farewell to the Forest," also two new pieces, "Phyllis" and "Chloe" the former composed for the occasion by Mr. L. S. Palmer, of Worthing. Mr. Goosen played Liszt's Rhapsodic, Hongroise, and Rubinstein's Valse Caprice most brilliantly, and Mr. Robey gave an excellent rendering of Batiste's Offertoire in D, and Bach's Fugue in D minor.

BRISTOL.—On Monday, February 28, another of Mr. Riseley's popular Concerts was given in the Colston Hall, when a splendid programme was extremely well rendered. The principal items were Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Symphony in G minor, the Overtures Rosamunde (Schubert), William Tell (Rossini), and Mireille (Gounod), and Berlioz' March from Faust. Ducodroy's Gavotte and Desarmes' "Mandolinata" were also performed. The vocalists were Madame Thaddeus Wells and Miss Emilie Lloyd.—On Monday, the 7th ult., Mr. W. Sutton, Organist of St. Michael's Church, gave his annual Concert in the Blind Asylum Music Hall. An excellent programme was given, and the Concert was thoroughly well patronised. The performers were all local, and included Madame Pennington, Miss Kate Hayes, Miss Sutton, Mr. E. Needs, Mr. T. Hardwick, Mr. Sidney Morgan, and Mr. H. J. Dyer. Mr. R. G. Parmenter acted as accompanist, and played a violin solo.—On Monday, the 14th ult., Mr. Riseley gave another of his popular Concerts at the Colston Hall, when the band performed Haydn's Military Symphony in G, the Overtures, Die Zauberflöte (Mozart), Oberon (Weber), The Merry Wives of Windsor (Nicolai), and Delibes's Intermezzo and Slow Waltz Pizzicato from the ballet "Sylvia, or the Nymphs of Diana"; Hummel's Concerto in E, for piano-forte and orchestra, was also splendidly performed, the solo instrument being taken by Mr. J. L. Roeckel. The vocalists were Mr. Ben. Gay and Mr. C. Fredericks; the former singing "Ye banks and braes" and "Oft in the still night," the accompaniments for which had been specially arranged for muted band by Mr. Riseley. Mr. A. W. Waite led the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted.—On Saturday, the 19th ult., two Concerts were given at the Colston Hall by the band of Her Majesty's Royal Horse Guards (Blue), under the conductorship of Mr. C. Godfrey. The principal items in the programme were the Overtures, Semiramide and Crown Diamonds, and selections from I Puritani, La Traviata, Cloches de Corneville, &c. The band also played, in conjunction with the grand organ (Mr. G. Riseley), the following Marches:—La Reine de Saba, Le Prophète, and "Israelites" (Eli), also the Prayer from Moses in Egypt, and a Fantasia "Reminiscences of Handel." Mr. Riseley contributed two organ solos, and Miss Marian Burton was the vocalist.

BYFLEET.—Mr. Fred. Monk, on resigning his appointment as Organist and Choirmaster of St. Mary's, Byfleet, has been presented by some members of the congregation with a testimonial, consisting of Bach's "Organ Compositions" (2 vols.), Hopkins and Rimbault on "The Organ," Schumann's "Music and Musicians," and Broadhouse's "Musical Acoustics." The Choir of the Church have also given him a token of their respect and good wishes, in the form of a handsome inkstand.

CHELtenham.—Mr. J. A. Matthews gave his last subscription Choral Concert for the present season in the Assembly Rooms, before a crowded audience, on Tuesday evening, the 22nd ult., when Handel's Oratorio, Judas Maccabæus, was performed with great success. The Oratorio was preceded by the "Dead March" in Saul, played in memory of the late Emperor of Russia. The instrumental parts were exceedingly well rendered throughout, and reflected great credit on the local musicians. The choruses were excellently given, and received with frequent applause. The solos were sung by Miss Eleanor Falkner, Miss Eva Neate, Miss Emilie Lloyd, R.A.M., Miss Palmer, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, Mr. D. Harrison, and Messrs. Twining and C. Gilding. The Concert was thoroughly enjoyed, and concluded a successful season. Mr. E. G. Woodward was leader of the band, and Mr. J. A. Matthews conducted.

CIRENCESTER.—On Thursday evening, February 24, the members of the Choral Society, assisted by a full band, gave a most successful performance of Handel's Oratorio, the Messiah, in the Corn Hall. Mr. E. Brind, to whose zealous and skilful labour so much of the success was due, conducted. The solo vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Miss E. A. Jones, Mr. Twining, Mrs. Chester Master, Rev. R. Viney, Mr. Everard, and Mr. Philips.

COLNBROOK, NEAR WINDSOR.—On Tuesday, the 15th ult., the Colnbrook Choral Class gave a Concert in the Harlington Lecture Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of anthems, and the second of songs, glees, and part-songs. Miss E. Tatnell presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Richards at an American organ. Mr. Richard Ratcliff acted as Conductor. The chorus numbered twenty-five voices.

CROYDON.—A Concert was given by the members of the British Glee Union on Thursday, the 17th ult., at the Public Hall. The vocalists were Mr. Sidney Barnby, Mr. H. Parkin, Mr. Lovett King, Mr. Prenton, and Madame Adeline Paget. The programme was well selected, and its execution in every detail highly commendable. Mr. Lovett King was the accompanist, and during the evening sang two buffo songs.

DENBIGH.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was given by the Philharmonic Society at the second Concert on February 25. Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Gertrude Bradwyn, Mr. Inman Moore, and Mr. T. Brandon took the principal parts. Major Casson rendered much service at the harmonium, and Mr. Stephenson ably led the orchestra. Mr. Felix C. Watkins conducted.

DEVIZES.—A Concert was given at the Town Hall on Monday evening, February 28, by the members of the Amateur Vocal Society. Mrs. G. Smith presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Clarke, the Conductor, at the harmonium. The programme, which was miscellaneous, was rendered with great precision. The part-songs were very well sung. At the conclusion of the performance the Mayor expressed his thanks on behalf of the audience for the treat Mr. Clarke and the members of the Society had afforded them.

DONCASTER.—On Tuesday evening, the 1st ult., a Choral Service took place in Christ Church—the first of the kind ever held within this edifice. Proper Psalms were used, 103 being sung to an easy and familiar chant by Hayes in E, and 150 to Humphreys' chant. The Magnificat was sung to an adapted chant in A, and the Nunc dimittis to Croft in B minor. The chief effort of the evening was the rendering of Mendelssohn's Cantata, Hear my Prayer. The treble solo was taken by Master H. Moore, and admirably sung. The chorus numbered over ninety, including a large number of Mr. Spinney's choral class. The organ accompaniments were excellently rendered, both in the Cantata and other parts of the Service, by Mr. Spinney. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. R. W. Pitt, M.A. The first lesson was read by the Rev. W. R. Hannam, B.A., and the second by the Vicar, the Rev. Canon Brock, M.A. A suitable and excellent sermon was preached by the Rev. A. P. Purey-Cust, D.D., Dean of York.

DUNSTER.—On Tuesday, the 1st ult., the Dunster Philharmonic Society gave its second Concert of the season, which was exceedingly well attended. The programme consisted of Gadsby's Cantata, The Lord of the Isles (first performance in the West of England). The soloists were Miss Mary Sharland, Mrs. Windsor, Rev. W. P. Mitchell, Rev. R. M. Todd, Dr. Clark, and Mr. J. H. Davis. The characteristic music was well sung, and a small but efficient orchestra, supplemented by Mrs. West at the piano and Mr. F. B. Erridge at the harmonium, rendered the overture and accompaniments with much effect. Mr. John Warriner, A. Mus., T. C. L., Organist of the parish church, conducted.

EAST MOLESLEY.—A Choral and Instrumental Festival was held in St. Paul's on Monday, February 28, being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Dedication. At eight o'clock the orchestra and organ played "Marche Romaine" (Gounod), while the choir, some sixty in number, marched to their seats. The Overture to Samson, and Hymn 379 having been given, the usual festival service began. The Pastoral Symphony preceded the anthem, "Oh, how amiable are Thy dwellings" (Barbry), in the rendering of which the choir and orchestra showed signs of good training and leadership. At the conclusion the band played "The Cornelius March." Mr. Phillips (for Mr. Rivenhall) and Mr. F. Smith (the Organist) were the Conductors.

EDINBURGH.—A performance of Handel's Theodora was given in the Literary Institute Hall, on the 14th ult., by the Nicolson Street Church Musical Association, in presence of a crowded audience, this being the first occasion on which the Oratorio had been heard in Edinburgh. The soloists, Misses Outerson, Moir, and Wilkie, and Messrs. Banks and Glenorse, acquitted themselves most creditably; several of the airs with which the Oratorio abounds being redemanded. The choruses were, without exception, sung in a manner which betokened thorough familiarity with the music. The overture and accompaniments were carefully played by the orchestra, led by Mr. Daly; Mr. Osborne W. Pinck presided at the harmonium; and Mr. J. S. Anderson, Mus. Bac., Oxon., conducted. Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley's Organ Recital, on the 17th ult., had, as usual, a crowded audience. The programme comprised several numbers not previously heard in the Class-room, all of which were thoroughly appreciated and loudly applauded.

FOLKESTONE.—On Monday evening, February 28, an Organ Recital was given in the Wesleyan Chapel by Mr. H. S. Roberts, the Organist. The programme was well carried out, nearly every piece eliciting symptoms of approval from the audience. Mr. Schartau and Mr. Bramley were the vocalists.

HAMILTON, CANADA.—Mr. W. E. Fairclough gave his third annual Concert, in the Cathedral School-room, on the 1st ult. The programme comprised the Andante and Finale of Mendelssohn's C minor Concerto, with string quintet accompaniment; the first two movements of Romberg's Turkish Symphony, septet arrangement; Chopin's Valse in A flat, Op. 34; Bellini's Aria, "Qui la voce"; "Love sounds the alarm" from Handel's Acis; and Dr. Garrett's part-song for male voices, "Hope." The soloists were Mrs. Caldwell and Mr. Jenkins, vocalists; Mr. O'Brien, violin; and Mr. Fairclough, pianoforte.

HELSTON.—On Tuesday, the 1st ult., Mr. Thuell gave his biennial Concert in the Assembly Rooms; assisted by Mr. Edwin A. U'Glow, the Misses White, Mr. H. White, Mr. Wren (Penzance), and Messrs. Rowe and Still (Redruth). Mr. Still's singing was much appreciated. Mr. Thuell, assisted by Miss Penrose, accompanied.

HEREFORD.—Mr. Fredericks, the principal tenor of Hereford Cathedral Choir, gave a most successful Concert at the Shire Hall on Monday, February 28. Mr. Fredericks was assisted by Miss Kate Shackell, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Lewis Thomas, vocalists; Mdlle. Hélène de Lisle, solo violinist; and Mr. D. P. French Davis, harpist. The pianoforte and American organ accompaniments were played respectively by Mr. Langdon Colborne, Mus. Bac. Cantab., and Mr. Heins. The instruments were kindly lent by the last-mentioned gentleman.

HORSHAM.—A Concert was given on Thursday, February 24, at the King's Head Assembly Rooms, by the members of the Horsham Vocal Union, a new musical society, lately formed under the direction of Mr. W. G. Sharp. In order to insure the success of this their first public Concert, the committee secured the services of Miss Jessie Jones, Mrs. Bucknall-Eyre, and Mr. Alfred J. Eyre, Organist of the Crystal Palace. The programme, which was miscellaneous, included Macfarren's Cantata, May Day. The choruses were rendered with intelligence and precision, and the glees for male voices were worthy of great commendation.

IRVINE.—A successful performance of Judas Maccabæus was given by the members of the Choral Union on the 18th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. M. Arthur. The solo singers were Miss Irvine, Miss Fyfe, Mr. Murray, and Mr. Fleming. The choruses were, on the whole, well rendered. Mr. Hinchcliffe, Organist to the parish church, presided at the organ in his usual efficient style.

KING'S HEATH, NEAR BIRMINGHAM.—A Concert was given at the Institute on Friday evening, the 18th ult. Trios and duets were performed by young ladies, members of the pianoforte class, and a selection of part-songs by the Institute Choral Society. The Ode to the North-East Wind, by Alice, and Miss Smith, was very fairly rendered, and Macfarren's "Sands of Dee," and Pierson's "Hurrah for merry England," were sung with taste and spirit. Vocal solos were contributed by Mr. and Mrs. Roper and Mr. Lusted. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. S. S. Stratton, and formed part of the Institute programme of the season.

LIMERICK.—On the evening of February 23, a performance of the Messiah, in aid of the Cathedral Restoration Fund, was given in St. Mary's Cathedral by a choir of 130 voices, with organ and orchestral accompaniments, under the conductorship of the Organist, Mr. G. F. H. Rogers. The choruses were, without exception, sung in a style that reflects the greatest credit on the Conductor. The solos were also admirably rendered by amateurs, and gave universal satisfaction. The instrumentalists, led by Mr. R. M. Levey, deserve commendation not only for their masterly performance of the Pastoral Symphony, but also for the judicious manner in which they accompanied the solos, and the efficient aid they rendered to the vocalists throughout the choral portions of the work.

LITTLEPORT.—A very successful Concert was given on Tuesday, the 2nd ult., at the Town Hall, by Mr. G. Minns, Mr. T. Haslop, Mr. J. Turner, and Mr. J. Bickley (of the Ely Cathedral choir), assisted by the Misses Briggs and Beates, and Mr. R. Creak. There was a very appreciative audience. The programme consisted of glees, part-songs, and solos, vocal and instrumental. Mr. George Minns conducted.

LIVERPOOL.—A Concert was given at the Philharmonic Hall on the 4th ult., in aid of the fund which is being raised on behalf of the widow and family of Mr. T. J. Hughes, a well-known and much-respected local basso. The performers, who kindly gave their services on the occasion, were Madame Edith Wynne, Madame Billinie Porter, Eos Morlais, Mr. Lucas Williams, the Liverpool Vocalists' Union, and a full band and chorus of 300, comprising members of the principal local musical societies. Leader, Mr. Lawson; Organist, Mr. Jude; pianoforte, Mr. Skeaf; and Conductor, Mr. Armstrong. The programme consisted of the first and second parts of Haydn's Creation, and a miscellaneous selection. The part-songs of the Liverpool Vocalists' Union (Conductor, Mr. T. C. Jones) fully sustained the high reputation of this well-chosen choir of male voices. The veteran Conductor (Mr. Armstrong) kept his forces well together, and was ably assisted, in their departments, by Mr. Lawson, Mr. Jude, and Mr. Skeaf. The result of this enjoyable Concert will be a substantial addition to the fund.

MANCHESTER.—On Monday evening, February 28, Mr. C. E. Rowley, Organist of Warrington Parish Church, gave, with his Musical Union, the third of a series of Concerts at the Cheetham Town Hall. The ballad Opera, No Song, no Sinner, interspersed with songs and glees, was very creditably performed. The concluding item was the new Operetta, A Fit of the blues.

NEW YORK.—The fourth Soirée given by the New York Philharmonic Club at Chickering Hall on February 8, was strictly confined to chamber music. Three pieces constituted the programme, and the only performers were the four principal members of the club—Messrs. Arnold, Gramm, Gantzberg, and Werner—and Mr. Richard Hoffman. Mozart's Quartet in C, No. 6, stood first on the programme, but the success of the evening was the Trio in F sharp of Xaver Scharwenka, played by Mr. Arnold (violin), Mr. Werner (cello), and Mr. Hoffman (pianoforte), which was enthusiastically applauded, the second movement being encored. The third and last number on the programme was Schumann's Quintet in F, Op. 47, No. 2.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—The last Concert of the Chamber Music Society for the present season was given with much success at the Town Hall, on February 25. An excellent programme was provided, the rendering of which gave the utmost satisfaction to a large audience. The instrumentalists were Mr. Marshall Hall Bell—the founder of the Society—(pianoforte), and Messrs. Straus, Gibson, Burnett, and Pezze (strings); Miss Eleanor Burnett being the solo vocalist. Mr. Marshall Bell was an able Conductor.—The Concert of chamber music given by Miss Hildegard Werner and Mr. J. H. Beers in the Northumberland Rooms, on the 10th ult., was, as it deserved to be, a complete success. Miss H. Werner and Mr. J. H. Beers (piano and violin), were the leading instrumentalists, the others being Messrs. H. Beers, A. A. Hunt, and S. Beers. The work best received was a Quartet in C minor by Joachim Raff, which was heard for the first time in Newcastle. Mr. W. F. Whatford was the vocalist.

NEWPORT.—A very attractive musical performance was given at the Albert Hall by Mr. E. W. Perren's Choral Class, on Tuesday evening, the 1st ult. The first part of the programme consisted of Handel's Serenata Acis and Galatea. Miss Julia Jones, of Cheltenham, Mr. J. Arthur White, Mr. Richards, Mr. E. G. R. Richards, and Mr. J. F. Rowe were the soloists. Most of the choruses were sung with considerable precision and effect, and displayed evidence of careful training. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. The accompaniment consisted of pianoforte and harmonium, at which Mrs. Ralph Brown and Miss Holdsworth presided. Mr. Perren conducted.

NEWTOWN.—A very successful Concert was given in the Public Rooms on February 24, by the United Choral Society, assisted by Miss Mary Davies, Miss Gertrude Lewis, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Lucas Williams. Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral the May Queen formed the first part of the programme. The recitatives and solos allotted to the soprano were charmingly rendered by Miss Davies. Mr. Hirwen Jones's agreeable voice proved exceedingly effective in the duet "Can I not find?" In the air "Tis jolly to hunt," Mr. Lucas Williams was very successful, as was Miss Gertrude Lewis in the part of the Queen. The choir, numbering some 100 voices, sang the choruses admirably. The second part of the programme comprised a selection of ballads, songs, and unaccompanied part-music. Mrs. Stanton and Miss Fanny Lewis divided the duties of accompanists upon pianoforte and harmonium, and their excellent playing of the Overture and Pageant music in the May Queen was a noteworthy feature of the performance. Mr. J. C. Gittins conducted.

NORTH WALSHAM.—The North Walsham Amateur Musical Society, which has won for itself a high place in the Norfolk Musical world, gave a very successful Concert (the first of the present season) on Tuesday evening, the 1st ult. The work performed was the Creation, the principal singers being Miss Trevenna, Mr. H. J. Brookes, and Mr. R. de Lacy. The band (under the leadership of Mr. F. W. B. Noverre) and chorus consisted of about ninety performers. Dr. Horace Hill, of Norwich, ably conducted.

OCKLEY.—Mr. Charles G. Sadler, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his fifth annual Concert on Monday, February 28, in the School-room, assisted by Miss Annie Tate, R.A.M., Miss Marks, Miss Green, Mrs. Calvert, Fraulein Riesberg, Mr. Jardine, Mr. Du Sautoy, Colonel Calvert, and the Choir of the parish church. Mr. Sadler, besides conducting, played, with Mrs. Calvert, Raff's Tarantella in D minor, which was much appreciated.

OPORTO.—On Monday, February 21, the Salvini Amateur Singing Club gave its first Concert, at the Gil Vicente Theatre for the benefit of the Oporto fishermen. The performance was most successful. With the exception of the Quintet Serenade for piano, harmonium, violin, violoncello, and flute, by Widor, the programme was entirely vocal, and included three choruses from Il Trovatore, with orchestra, and in character, Mr. H. Kendall in "Il Balen," being much applauded. The air "Alma soave e cara," from Maria di Rohan, was excellently rendered by Mr. H. D. Ritson. The comic trio "Di Pandolfette Medico," from Crispino e la Comare, was very well sung and acted by Messrs. A. Kendall, Roughton, and Ritson. The lady vocalist, Miss L. Basto, was also warmly received. Signor G. R. Salvini conducted and presided at the piano.

OTTAWA.—The third and last of Mr. Harrison's Chamber Concerts was given on the 5th ult., with a programme of much interest, including a Quartet of Haydn, and the Trio in C minor of Mendelssohn. Mrs. Harrison's pianoforte solos were also a feature of the evening; and high praise must be awarded to M. Prume for his violin playing, both in the concerted and solo pieces. The vocalist was Miss M. Elwood, whose songs were most artistically accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Oliver King.

POOLE.—A Concert for the benefit of Mr. Joseph Smith, the conductor of the Poole Musical Association, was given by the members at the Skinner Street Rooms, on Monday, February 28. The choir numbered forty voices. Spohr's Last Judgment which was effectively rendered, was followed by a secular selection. The soloists were Mr. Hayden (of Salisbury Cathedral), Messrs. Sedgfield, Belben, Percy Smith, Wills, and Palmer, and Mesdames Newling, Philpots, and Gillard. Mr. Hayden and Mrs. Newling received an enthusiastic reception from the large audience assembled.

READING.—On Tuesday afternoon, the 1st ult., a Concert Lecture on the "Life and Works of Joseph Haydn" was given in the Foresters' Hall, by Mr. A. D. Coleridge. The subject was treated in an able manner, and made the more enjoyable by numerous musical examples in which the solos were given by Mrs. Coleridge, Miss Bennett, and Mr. Kempton (of St. Paul's Cathedral), the choruses being sung by members of the County Amateur Society.—On the same evening a Concert of the Reading Philharmonic Society was given at the Town Hall, when Barnett's Ancient Mariner, Mendelssohn's Loreley, and two overtures were performed, conducted by Mr. W. H. Strickland. The soloists were Madame Wilson Oswan, Miss Stokes, Captain Carter, and Mr. Dalzell (of the Westminster Abbey Choir).

REDRUTH.—On Thursday, the 17th ult., a Concert was given in aid of the Institute, at Druid's Hall. Miss Madden (a pupil of Mr. Thuell's) elicited great applause, and was encored in both of her songs. The other vocalists were Messrs. White, U'Glow, and Wren. Harp and violin solos were contributed by Messrs. Hauke and Thomas. The part-songs were well sung by the Choir. Mr. Thuell conducted throughout.

ST. LEONARDS.—A Concert was given by the members of the church choir, assisted by Mr. Stone, of Chesham, and Mr. C. E. Jolly, organist of Wheathamestead, on Tuesday, the 1st ult. Mr. Stone sang in his usual refined manner, and Mr. Lampitt also gave one or two songs; both singers being encored. The efforts of Mr. G. Brackley, Mr. Goodchild, Mr. Reed, Miss M. Brackley, and Miss M. Reed called forth repeated and loud applause. The glees were ably accompanied by Mr. G. Brackley. Two duets, for pianoforte and violin, by Mrs. H. G. Watson and Mr. Jolly were thoroughly appreciated.

SALISBURY.—The Choir of St. Thomas's Church gave a Concert at the Assembly Rooms, on Thursday evening, February 24, in aid of the Choir fund, under the direction of Mr. A. Aylward (Organist of the church). The principal feature of the evening was the performance of the band. The programme was miscellaneous, and included the Overtures Le Maçon (Dubois) and Stradella (Flotow), the Gavotte from Mignon (Thomas), Melodie Antique (Arnard), March, "Turkish Patrol" (Michaelis), encores, &c. The songs by Miss Greenly, Mrs. Wells, Mrs. Figes, and Mr. Wells-Lillyman were deservedly encored. Miss Alexander, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Simmonds also contributed vocal solos. The choir sung two part-songs in a highly creditable manner. Mr. A. Aylward conducted. The Concert was a great success.

SCARBOROUGH.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of God, Thou art great (Spohr), and Acis and Galatea, in the Londesborough Rooms on the 18th ult. Great praise is due to the Conductor, Mr. E. H. Holder, for the creditable manner in which the works were rendered. Miss Farbstein and Messrs. Macdonald and McCall were the vocalists.

SEAFORTH, NEAR LIVERPOOL.—The Amateur Orchestral Society lately started in this suburb gave its first open Rehearsal on Monday, February 28. The programme was miscellaneous. The performance gave great satisfaction, and the manner in which the programme was carried out reflected great credit upon the amateur players as well as upon Mr. J. R. Alsop, their Conductor. A noticeable feature was the accompaniment to the vocal music by the band.

SELKIRK, N.B.—The members of the Choral Union gave their annual Concert on the 17th ult., when Handel's Samson was performed before a large and appreciative audience. Mrs. Smith, Miss M. Wilkie, Mr. G. Banks, and Mr. A. McCall were the principal vocalists, and Mr. W. Mitchell, F.C.O., was an efficient Conductor.

SHEFFIELD.—Under the auspices of the Church of England Band of Hope Association a Service of Song was given on Monday, February 28, in the Albert Hall, entitled "The Musical Æsop." The choir, chosen almost exclusively from members of Bands of Hope associated with local churches, numbered about 500 voices. The Master Cutler (Mr. W. Chesterman) presided. The Rev. R. B. de Wolf was the reader, Mr. Tallis Trimmell presided at the organ, and Mr. A. Kaye conducted. Of the singing of the children it is almost impossible to speak in terms sufficiently warm. The second part of the programme consisted of solos on the organ by Mr. Trimmell, on the piano by Miss Clara Linley, and some songs by the choir.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., U.S.—At the Concert of the Hampden and Hampshire County Musical Association, on February 18, the sensation of the evening was the singing of Herr Georg Henschel. He accompanied himself on the piano in an air from Handel's music to Dryden's ode of Alexander's Feast, and again in two remarkable songs of the seventeenth century. The great aria from the Messiah, "Why do the nations?" was given with the orchestra, and with extraordinary power. Herr Henschel's piano playing was also admirable, and he is evidently a man of culture beyond his special art. Mrs. Humphrey-Allen was highly effective in Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, her solo "The night is departing," and her portion of the duet "My song shall be always Thy mercy," creating a marked effect with the audience. The chorus, considerably strengthened from their last Concert, achieved good results in the Mendelssohn Cantata. The sopranos still overbear the other parts, but all sang with intelligence. The work of the Harvard symphony artists was, it need not be said, everything that could be wished. The symphony of the Hymn of Praise received appreciative and adequate treatment, as on its previous production, and the Concert was in every respect a decided success.

STRATFORD.—A Concert of Sacred Music at the Congregational Church on the 22nd ult., attracted a large audience. The programme opened with Gounod's Marche Romaine, well rendered on the organ by Mr. E. J. Scrine. The choir, consisting of about ninety voices, gave with much effect Mendelssohn's choruses "How lovely are the messengers" and "Yet doth the Lord"; and Mr. A. Gowar deserves notice for his delivery of "Ye people rend your hearts," by the same master. The honours of the evening were divided between Madame Bolingbroke and Miss Cecilia Fuller, both ladies receiving encores. Mr. S. M. Wilson was an efficient Conductor.

SURBITON.—The first of a series of four Concerts, arranged by Miss Margaret English, was held on Thursday, February 24, at the Surbiton Park Lecture Hall. The chief honours of the evening fell upon Mrs. Osgood, who sang brilliantly two songs, "Dost thou know" (Mignon), by Thomas, and Ferri's "Two by two." The only other lady vocalist was Mrs. Edwyn Frith, who, although suffering from a slight throat affection, rendered very ably "It was a dream," and "Across the river"; and also joined Mr. Edwyn Frith and Mr. J. Williams in Curschmann's trio, "Ti prego." Mr. Frith's two songs, "The Midshipmite," and Hatten's "Old Jack Salt," elicited warm and well deserved applause; and Mr. Williams's vocal pieces were also well received. Mlle. Bertha Brouil, besides taking part with Mons. Adolphe and Mr. Bond Andrews in a trio, composed by the latter gentleman, played with much success two violin solos—Handel's Sonata in B, and Lasserre's "Fileuse"; and Mr. Hann proved himself an able violoncellist in a Sarabande and Gavotte, and a Tarantelle. Mr. Bond Andrews's execution of the pianoforte pieces, Chopin's Etude valse, and Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise, must also be commended; and we may conscientiously congratulate Miss English upon the success of her Concert.

THORNTON HEATH.—The second Subscription Concert of the Musical Society was given in the Thornton Heath Public Hall on Thursday, February 24, before a large audience. The work selected was Haydn's Creation. The band of the Society was aided by some members of the Crystal Palace orchestra. The soprano music was well rendered by Madame St. Clements, who was much applauded in the airs "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens." Mr. William Lloyd sang the part of Raphael, and was very successful in "Rolling in foaming billows" and the recitative "And God said, Let the firmament." The tenor music was ably interpreted by Mr. Arthur Wilmot. The choruses throughout were given with much precision. Mr. Bawtree conducted.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—A highly successful Concert was given in the Great Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 1st ult., by the Chapel of Ease Choral Society. The programme consisted of Handel's Acis and Galatea and Romberg's Cantata The Transient and the Eternal, which were performed by a band and chorus of eighty instrumentalists and vocalists. The principal vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Annie Knight, Mr. H. Guy, Mr. Chilly, and Mr. W. Winn. Mr. Whitehead led the band, and Mr. O. Stimpson, Mus. Bac., Oxon., conducted. The choir was in a high state of efficiency, and the rendering of the works gave the greatest satisfaction.

WARRINGTON.—The Musical Society gave its second Concert of the season on the 1st ult., when Herr Hofmann's Cantata The Fair Melusina was performed. The professional soloists were Miss Marian Williams and Mr. Thurley Beale; and Miss James and Mr. Eccles, two members of the choir, also gave efficient aid in the vocal solos and concerted portions of the work. The orchestra has greatly improved, and the choir never sang better. Mr. Pattison played the organ accompaniments, and Dr. Hiles conducted.

WATLINGTON.—The Philharmonic Society gave a Concert in the Lecture Hall on Tuesday evening, the 15th ult., when Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jairus was performed, the solos being taken by Mrs. Jones and Mr. Probert. At recent Concerts the Society has shown great advance in the chorus singing—the credit of which must be divided between Mr. Cope and those under his careful training—but any previous excellence the choir may have attained was certainly surpassed on this occasion. The second part of the Concert consisted of a selection from Elijah, in which Mr. Probert, Mr. Cope, Mrs. White, and Miss Hobbs rendered valuable assistance. Miss Boyton accompanied throughout with accuracy, and also played in the introductory duets with Mr. Clark (harmonium). Mr. S. Cope conducted.

WELLINGBOROUGH.—On Wednesday evening, the 9th ult., a Concert of Sacred Music was given in the Congregational Church, the choir and band numbering eighty performers. The Overture to Handel's Esther, and Root's Cantata, Daniel, were performed in a most efficient manner. The band was ably led by Mr. J. Sanderson; Miss Marriott presided at the organ, and Mr. W. J. Lamb (the Organist of the church) conducted.

WEYBRIDGE.—Mr. H. P. G. Brooke, F.C.O., Organist and Choir-master of St. James's Church, gave his ninth annual benefit Ballad Concert at the Institute on Monday, February 28. The programme was selected with great judgment, and highly appreciated by a large audience. Mr. Brooke conducted and accompanied with excellent taste and skill. The songs, ballads, and duets were all highly successful, displaying considerable artistic skill on the part of all the singers.

MR. J. HAMILTON,
6, CHESTERTON TERRACE, CITY ROAD,

MANUFACTURER OF

Pedals and Action for Pianofortes,

Begs to inform Organists, Organ Students, and others that his invention for attaching PEDALS to PIANOFORTES is so useful that it has earned the approbation of over a thousand members of the musical profession. For a small outlay the great pleasure of playing organ music (from Bach's Grand Fugues to the late Henry Smart's beautiful movements) at home can be obtained. This action is easily attached to any kind of Pianoforte in a short time, as it is all sent complete with printed instructions "How to attach."

A Set of Straight Pedals (CC to F, 30 notes), with action and printed instructions, price £4 4s.

TESTIMONIAL.

Brinscall, near Chorley, February 4, 1881.

Sir,—I received the pedals and action yesterday, and have got it attached to my pianoforte. I must say that its utility and usefulness exceed all my expectations, it is perfectly noiseless and just what every organist or any one wishing for pedal practice at home ought to have. I should have had a set of your pedals years ago had I known they acted so well.—I remain, yours most truly,

J. AINSWORTH, Professor of Music.

To Mr. J. HAMILTON.

Agents are required for every town and district.

Send for prices to the profession and trade; also for testimonials. Orders accompanied with cheque or P.O. order will receive immediate attention.

From GEO. G. INGRAM, Esq.

Huntley, N. B., March 1, 1881.

Dear Sirs,—The harmonium came safely to hand yesterday. I had founded high hopes regarding it, but can truthfully assure you that its beauty and excellence exceed all my anticipations. The tone is sweet, pure and yet powerful; the articulation is perfect and prompt; while the upper notes—unlike those of many harmoniums—make themselves distinctly heard, however heavy a bass is being played. The design of the case is very artistic. Altogether I am very proud of my purchase, and beg to thank you for having done so handsomely towards me. I shall take every opportunity of showing off the instrument. I have had many people looking at it and all have given most favourable opinions; one gentleman—who occupies a leading position as an Organist and Conductor in Aberdeen—said he could extemporise for almost any length of time upon it without being fatigued, so pleasant was its tone and so ready its answer to the fingers.—I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

GEO. G. INGRAM.

"The volume before us is, indeed, a model of cheapness combined with elegance and convenient arrangement. It contains, in 518 neatly printed pages, everything Mendelssohn has written for the pianoforte, from the Capriccio in F sharp minor, Op. 5, composed in 1825, at the age of 16, to his latest works, including several published after his death. . . . A student will find no end of interesting points in the works here collected, but to the more advanced amateur also they will be a source of purest enjoyment. We need not add that the stately volume before us is eminently adapted to serve as an elegant and valuable gift-book at this or, indeed, at any season of the year."—The Times.

VERDI'S OPERA "SIMON BOCCANEGRA" AT THE SCALA OF MILAN.

THERE is no city in Italy in which Verdi has more admirers and has achieved greater triumphs than in Milan. Whatever the opinions and criticisms elsewhere, in Milan he has hitherto enjoyed undisputed supremacy, and at the Scala he can still hold his own against any new comer. The reason is not far to seek. As in her sentiments and aspirations Milan is, perhaps, of all Italian cities the most Italian, so is Verdi, perhaps, the most Italian of all living Italian composers, and it is therefore the strong chord of national sympathy that knits them together. This was strikingly exemplified by the recent production at the Scala of the composer's remodelled and reformed opera, "Simon Boccanegra," which was received with all the enthusiasm the Milanese have never failed to accord to their old favourite.

The history of the opera under notice is somewhat remarkable. It was brought out at the "Fenice" of Venice on March 13, 1857, that is twenty-four years ago, at a time when Venice, though still under Austrian rule, presented a much more animated appearance, and enjoyed and criticised music much more keenly than now. "Simon Boccanegra" then proved a complete failure; and Verdi's friends complained bitterly that the Venetians treated the new opera, not as a question of taste or judgment, but simply as a party question, and that by condemning and hissing the music as new-fangled, they gave eloquent proof of their own ignorance. This, however, by no means altered the fact that the opera was a failure, and it was therefore shelved until Verdi recently rescued his old friend from oblivion, and having secured Boito's invaluable assistance for revising the libretto, clothed the opera in a new and more vigorous form. It is a noticeable fact that the second act, which alone remains substantially unaltered, is the only one that met with a comparatively cold reception at the Scala, showing plainly that Verdi's music of twenty-four years ago no longer satisfies modern ears—even of an Italian audience—already familiar with the more advanced school of "Aida."

The subject of the opera is one that recommended itself pre-eminently to a dramatic composer like Verdi. It supplied him with elements and situations after his own heart, from a death in the beginning to a death at the end of the opera, not to speak of the scenes of conspiracy, popular passion, attempted murder, and other horrors, with which the first and second acts are replete. The historical career of Simon Boccanegra, the first Doge of Genoa, elected in 1339, presents, per se, but scanty material for a drama; and Piave, the author of the original libretto, therefore added a love story to the historical framework. The drama depicts the political and domestic passions of the Genoese of that day in an almost brutal form; but Verdi has tempered its sensational character by investing it with essentially dramatic music, which is effective without being vulgar. And the success he has achieved, in rewriting an opera for which he has always had a decided predilection, is in no small degree due to Boito, whose powerful and ingenious, at times somewhat eccentric, pen as a dramatic poet is traceable in every page of the revised libretto.

The scene of the opera is laid in Genoa about the middle of the fourteenth century, and a space of twenty-five years intervenes between the prologue and the three acts into which the drama is divided. In the prologue, Simon Boccanegra, the famous corsair in the service of the Genoese republic, has returned to Genoa from Savona, at the instance of his friends Paolo and Pietro, the authors of a conspiracy for the purpose of making him the first Doge of Genoa by popular acclamation. At first he refuses to become the popular leader against the patricians, the more so as his life is blighted by the loss of Maria, the daughter of Fiescho, a Genoese noble. Against her father's will, she had eloped with the corsair, but had subsequently disappeared, and he had lost all trace, not only of her, but also of their child who bore her mother's name. His friends apprise him that Maria is kept prisoner in her father's palace, pining for her lover and her child. In the hope that Fiescho will not dare to refuse Maria's hand to him, the Doge of Genoa, he is induced to consent to the proposal of the conspirators. The aggrieved noble however turns a deaf ear to Simon's appeal, and promises forgiveness only in the event of Simon bringing back Maria's child, who had also mysteriously disappeared. Simon insists on seeing Maria, but only to learn her death at the very moment of his being proclaimed the first Doge of Genoa. So far the prologue.

The first act, twenty-five years later, takes us to the palace of the patrician family of the Grimaldi, where Amelia Grimaldi is anxiously awaiting the arrival of her lover, Gabriele Adorno, a young Genoese noble and implacable opponent of the popular Doge. She has been made aware that Paolo, the Doge's former confederate, and now a courtier, aspires to her hand, and that the Doge himself favours the design, which she is anxious to frustrate by hastening her union with Gabriele. Presently Simon Boccanegra himself appears on the scene, the bearer of a pardon of the wrongs the house of Grimaldi has inflicted on the popular cause, and takes the opportunity of pleading for Paolo. Amelia however reveals to him that she is not a Grimaldi, but only an adopted orphan, who turns out to be no other than the lost daughter of Simon and Maria. Though overpowered with joy at this discovery, Simon learns with dismay that she is in love with Gabriele, his political enemy; but they agree to keep the secret of her paternity and her love for the present, and the Doge confines himself to telling Paolo peremptorily that he must renounce all hope of ever winning Amelia Grimaldi. Paolo, incensed at this refusal at the hand of Simon, whom he had helped to raise to his exalted office, forthwith lays a plot to carry Amelia (Maria) off by force, and to implicate the Doge by spreading the report that the plot was instigated by himself for sinister designs of his own. The deed is to be accomplished by one of Paolo's creatures, but Maria finds means to effect her escape when already in his grasp. The news of this plot reaches the Doge while holding council in the palace. Gabriele, whose jealousy prompts him to believe the report spread by Paolo, charges the Doge with the rape of the innocent girl, and, in the presence of the Council, rushes upon him dagger in hand. The attempt fails, and Gabriele is handed over to the guard. In the meantime Maria (Amelia) appears on the scene to tell her own story, which leaves no doubt on Simon's mind that the whole plan was laid by Paolo. Fixing his eyes on Paolo, he pronounces the malediction on the perpetrator of the crime, and compels Paolo to repeat the curse after him. Paolo, however, is by no means at a loss for a new plot. He finds means to communicate with Gabriele, and induces him to attempt the Doge's life a second time, in his bedchamber. Gabriele, blinded with jealousy and revenge, is on the point of stabbing Simon while asleep, when Maria rushes in, throws herself between her father and her lover, and, having divulged to the latter the secret of her paternity, reconciles the two enemies at last. In the meantime an attempt has been made by the Guelfs to overthrow the Doge, in which conspiracy Paolo, of course, but also Fiescho, returned from exile, is implicated. This attempt, too, proves a failure; and Paolo, nothing daunted, now has resort to the ultimo ratio—viz., that of poisoning Simon Boccanegra. He apprises Fiescho of this new plot. The old patrician, however—a noble enemy—warns Simon, too late, alas! to save him, but not too late to forgive him on learning that in Amelia Grimaldi has been found the child of his daughter Maria. The dying Doge, having blessed Gabriele and Amelia (Maria), places the ducal wreath on the young noble's head, and Fiescho proclaims Gabriele Adorno as the second Doge of Genoa, the successor of Simon Boccanegra.

The plotting and intriguing which constitute the greater part of the dramatic action would be more than wearisome were it not for the broad contrast furnished by the character of the Doge, who stands out in bold relief from among all the horrors enacted by Paolo and his confederates. Simon Boccanegra, the popular, generous, honest Doge and affectionate father, is admirably drawn, and that is exclusively the merit of Boito, who remodelled this character almost entirely, making the sort of low demagogue of the original libretto into what Boccanegra really was—a patriotic and upright champion of the national cause. Gabriele Adorno lacks, perhaps, vigour; but, on the other hand, the sympathetic character of Amelia Grimaldi lends a peculiar charm to the dramatic action whenever she takes part in it.

The original score of "Simon Boccanegra," though its style was essentially that of "Ernani," "I Lombardi," &c., marked already an extension of form; so much so that the Venetians denounced it as a dangerous innovation. The score now before us does not even stop at "Aïda," but in dramatic colouring, in declamation, and in instrumentation, goes considerably beyond it. Indeed, it may be said that the alterations and additions Verdi has introduced refer almost exclusively to the orchestral part of the opera, and to the dramatic action which, by means of declamatory dialogue, he has made to a great extent continuous. Without, however, entering into a minute comparison between the old and the new score, we will consider the salient features of the opera as it is now presented. The prologue is preceded by a short prelude for stringed instruments, in keeping with the character of the prologue itself, which, with the first act, constitutes, perhaps, the most successful part of the opera. "Il lacerato spirito," an air for bass (Fiescho), the duet between Simon (baritone) and Fiescho which follows, and the grand finale, in which Simon is proclaimed Doge when overwhelmed with grief at finding Fiescho's daughter dead, may be named among the most effective and highly dramatic numbers of the prologue. The first act, which opens with a short prelude, "A sordini," is conspicuous for great wealth of musical ideas, which find expression in Maria's air, "Come in quest' ora bruna" (soprano), in the duet between the Doge and Maria, "Grave d' anni quella pia" (baritone and soprano), and above all in the magnificent and elaborate finale. It is the second part of the first act which Verdi has rewritten entirely, according to the principles of lyrical drama and modern instrumentation; so much so that it took the Milanese almost by surprise. The climax is reached in the finale, when Simon pronounces the curse, "Sia maledetto," on Paolo, forcing him to repeat it. The effect of this scene, enhanced by the scenic display and the character of the music, is very grand, and, like the prologue, produced indescribable enthusiasm. The second act, it must be owned, offers an unfavourable contrast to the first. Here and there Verdi has made some additions to the instrumentation, but, on the whole, this act is too much in keeping with the obsolete style of the composer's earliest works, and, therefore, falls decidedly flat. The third act, on the other hand, is again more advanced, the scoring and instrumentation are more in accordance with modern and extended form, and the duet between Fiescho and Simon, "Piango perche mi parla," is particularly conspicuous by the admirable instrumental colouring. The opera is brought to a close by a grand quartet somewhat in the style of that of "Rigoletto," and, in keeping as it is with the death of Simon Boccanegra, is of a sad and solemn character, rendered still more impressive by the funeral bell which accompanies its closing bars, whereupon Fiescho appears on the balcony of the palace, and proclaims Gabriele Adorno the new Doge of Genoa.

The execution of this interesting work was almost perfect. The opera was mounted with the utmost care under the personal superintendence of Verdi, who answered at least twenty times to the clamorous calls of the audience. It was conducted in a masterly manner by Signor Faccio, to whom belongs undoubtedly the palm among Italian conductors of the day, and who will have ample scope for displaying his skill during the forthcoming season at Her Majesty's Theatre. The part of the hero, Simon Boccanegra, was rendered by Victor Maurel, an artist, an actor, and a musician of the very first order. The grace, elegance, and dignity of his appearance, combined with his rich, sympathetic, and beautifully trained voice, kept the audience under a continuous spell, which has been felt by all those who have heard him in Thomas's "Hamlet," in Auteri's "Stella," or in Verdi's "Boccanegra." Signora D'Angeri was an admirable Maria, and Signor Tamagno's beautiful tenor voice imparted to the rather mild character of Gabriele some wholesome and much-needed vigour, whilst Signor de Reszké did full justice to the part of Fiescho, the old Genoese patrician.

Since the opening night "Simon Boccanegra" has been frequently repeated, with constantly increasing success; and even Verdi, who is used to triumphs of this kind, and receives ovations with a consciousness of deserving them, has every reason to be satisfied with the success this new edition of an old opera has obtained. The intensely dramatic nature of a national subject, handled by the refining pen of Boito, goes far to account for that success. The opera presents distinctly and in juxtaposition the earliest and the latest style of Verdi, and shows all the gradations and phases through which he has passed before becoming what he now is—a thorough-going disciple of lyrical drama. Apart from the necessary unevenness of the work in its new form, the expediency of the juxtaposition of the two opposing styles may fairly be questioned; but there can be no doubt that in the new "Simon Boccanegra" Verdi has once more revealed himself as a national, a progressive, and, in many respects, a great composer.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

BERLIOZ halted at Florence on his way back to Rome, and renewed his observations of a city which gave him occasion for some remarks strongly indicative of his emotional and sensitive nature. Strolling one day into the cathedral he witnessed the obsequies of a young mother and the infant whose birth had cost her life. Touched by the incident, he followed the procession to a cemetery, where the bodies were deposited in a dead-house till, according to custom, the grave-diggers came, at two a.m., to inter them. For a paola (twelve sous) Berlioz was permitted to enter the morgue and look upon the dead girl and her babe. "If I had been alone, I should have embraced her; I thought of Ophelia. For a paola!" The next day he attended the funeral service of Napoleon Bonaparte, brother of the late Emperor, and filled his mind with thoughts of the young man's mother, Queen Hortense. "My fancy, retracing the course of time, showed her, a joyous Creole child, dancing on the deck of the ship that brought her to the Old World, plain daughter of Madame Beauharnais; later, adopted daughter of the master of Europe, Queen of Holland; at last exiled, forgotten, orphaned, a distracted mother, a fugitive queen without a State." Thinking of all this what music would he have poured forth from the solemn organ; but the Italian practitioner at that instrument, instead of rising to the occasion, sank beneath contempt.

"Oh! Beethoven! . . . where was the grand soul, the profound and Homeric spirit which conceived the 'Eroica' symphony and the 'Funeral March for the Death of a Hero,' and so many other great and sad musical poems that elevate the soul while they oppress the heart? The organist had drawn his flute stop, and sportively whistled little gay airs in the upper octaves, like wrens, perched on a garden-wall, basking in the pale rays of a spring sun." This and the showing of dead bodies for a paola stirred his indignation against Italians all round.

"O Italians, misérables that you are, apes, ourang-outangs, puppets always sneering, who compose operas like those of Bellini, Pacini, Rossini, Vaccaï, and Mercadante; who play trivial airs at the funeral of the nephew of the Great Man, and who, for a paola. . . .!"

Here wrath seems to have choked him, and the uncomplimentary invocation comes to a sudden end. The Italians let us add, were never successful in pleasing Berlioz with their music. At the famous Easter-tide services in the Sistine chapel he almost laughed, and he denounced with all his might the idea that Palestrina possessed any musical genius whatever.

"In his psalms for four parts where melody and rhythm are not used, and where harmony takes the form of perfect chords intermixed with suspensions, one must admit that taste and a certain science have guided the composer; but genius—nonsense, it is a joke."

At Rome, Berlioz was repeatedly in Mendelssohn's company, and, had the German reciprocated the feeling of the Frenchman, a warm friendship would have sprung up between them. Writing from Nice before expelled by the police, and referring to his previous experience in Rome, he said:—

"I have found Mendelssohn. . . . He is an admirable lad; his executive talent is as great as his musical genius, and really that is saying much. All that I have heard of his delights me; I believe firmly that his musical capacity is one of the highest of our epoch. He has been my cicerone; every morning I go to him; he plays me a sonata of Beethoven; we sing Gluck's 'Armida' and then he takes me to see the famous ruins which, I must confess, interest me very little. Mendelssohn is one of those candid souls so rarely met with; he believes firmly in his Lutheran religion; and I greatly scandalise him sometimes by laughing at the Bible. To him I owe the only supportable moments I enjoyed during my stay in Rome."

Addressing Ferdinand Hiller, after a second time reaching the Eternal City, Berlioz said:—

"Has Mendelssohn reached you? He is a man of enormous, extraordinary, superb, prodigious talent. I shall not be suspected of comradeship in writing thus, for he has told me frankly that he does not understand my music at all. Say to him a thousand things for me. He has a character wholly virginal, and still has beliefs; he is a little cold in his manner, but, although he may doubt it, I greatly love him."

The life of Berlioz in Rome was far from happy. He appears to have suffered from a nervous affection which, stimulated by the melancholy city and its desolate surroundings, made the routine of common life insupportable. The feeling was connected in his mind with the ideas of isolation and absence, and he has thus described it:—

"A void surrounds my palpitating breast, and it seems then that my heart, under the constraint of an irresistible force, evaporates and tends to break up by expansion. Then the skin of my whole body becomes painful and burning; I am red from head to foot. I am tempted to cry out; to call my friends, and even indifferent people to my aid, to console, defend, and prevent me from being destroyed, to retain the life which goes away to all points of the compass. During these crises one has no thought of death; no, the idea of suicide is even insupportable; one would not die, far from that, one would live, willing it absolutely, and desiring a thousand times more of energy. It is a prodigious capacity for happiness, which becomes exasperated by remaining without satisfaction, and can only appease itself by immense, devouring, furious delights, in proportion to an incalculable abundance of sensibility."

Berlioz struggled hard against his disease, for so we may call it. He sought the pleasures of the chase, wandered alone for days together among the Abruzzi mountains, and spent some time in Naples; but each return to Rome brought back, with added force, his strange and painful feeling. To this there could only be one end.

"I had finished my monodrama, and retouched my 'Symphonie Fantastique.' It was necessary to have them performed. So I obtained from M. Vernet permission to leave Italy before the allotted time; posed for my portrait; made a grand tour of some days to Tivoli, Albano, and Palestrina; sold my gun, broke my guitar, wrote in several albums, gave a grand 'punch' to my comrades, caressed M. Vernet's two dogs, my companions of the chase, and had a moment of profound sorrow in the thought that I was quitting a poetic country never perhaps to see it again. Friends accompanied me nearly to Ponte Molle, where I ascended a shockingly bad carriage and started." On May 12, 1832, Berlioz crossed Mont Cenis, and directed his steps towards his ancestral home at Côte St. André.

It will easily be understood from what has appeared above that the time spent by Berlioz in Rome was not prolific in musical works. He himself tells us exactly what he did.

"First: An overture to 'Rob Roy,' long and diffuse, performed at Paris a year later, badly received by the public, and burnt the same day on leaving the concert. Second: The 'Scène aux Champs' of my 'Symphonie Fantastique,' which I rewrote almost entirely when wandering in the Villa Borghese. Third: The 'Chant de Bonheur' of my monodrame 'Lelio,' which I dreamt, rocked by my intimate enemy, the south wind, in the tall and bushy box-tree of our classic garden. Fourth: The melody called 'Le Captive,' of which, when composing it, I was far from anticipating the fortune."

In addition, when writing to a friend, Berlioz speaks of some concerted vocal pieces, among them "a chorus to words by Moore, with accompaniment for seven wind instruments; composed at Rome one day when I was dying of spleen, and entitled 'Psalmody for those who have suffered much, and whose soul is sad nearly unto death.'" A propos to the monodrame "Lelio," Berlioz may here tell one of his amusing stories. The work contains a chorus of ghosts, with words perfectly unmeaning, and, like those in the finale of "Faust," invented for the occasion.

"The text of this chorus was written in an unknown tongue, the language of the dead, incomprehensible to the living. When seeking permission to print from the Papal censor, the meaning of the words sung by the ghosts greatly embarrassed the officials. What was the language, and what did the strange words signify? They called in a German, who declared that he could make nothing of them; an Englishman was not more successful, and Danish, Swedish, Russian, Spanish, Irish, and Bohemian interpreters alike failed. How the office of the censor was embarrassed to be sure! Meanwhile leave to print could not be given, and the publication remained suspended. At last, one of the censors, after profound reflection, hit upon an idea, the justice of which all his colleagues admitted. 'Since the English, Russian, Spanish, Danish, Swedish, Irish, and Bohemian interpreters cannot divine this mysterious language, it is likely enough that the Roman people will not understand it either. It appears that we can authorise the impression without danger to morality or religion.' The chorus of ghosts was printed forthwith."

During the stay of Berlioz at Côte St. André, his father wished him to marry and "settle down," having, after the manner of French parents, chosen a young lady pecuniarily fitted for the alliance. Concerning this matter we read in a note to Madame Vernet:—

"My father has just hit upon a singular method of making me wise. He wishes me to marry. Presuming, right or wrong, upon data known to him, that my overtures would be well received by a very rich person, he pressed me strongly to present myself, for the peremptory reason that a young man who would inherit but a hundred thousand francs or so, ought not to neglect the opportunity of marrying three hundred thousand down and more in expectation. I laughed at the idea as a joke for some time, but as my father's suggestions became more pressing, I was obliged to declare categorically that I could never love the lady to whom he referred, and that I was not for sale at any price. The discussion ended there, but I was disagreeably affected by it. I thought my father knew me better. At bottom, madame, do you not think I was right?"

In the autumn of 1832, Berlioz went to Paris for the purpose of producing his monodrame "Lelio" and the "Symphonie Fantastique." Calling immediately upon Cherubini, he found the master very much enfeebled and looking aged. This was not the only change. So affectionate did Cherubini show himself that Berlioz thought, "Ah! mon Dieu, the poor man is going to die." But there was "life in the old dog yet," and the younger composer soon found it out. When seeking lodgings a curious coincidence happened, in which Berlioz saw the hand of fate. His old apartment not being free, a "secret impulse" made him look for one in the opposite house, where Miss Smithson had resided. Successful here, he said to the old domestic in charge, "What has become of Miss Smithson? Have you any news of her?" The reply was, "Why, sir, she is in Paris; she even lodged here a few days ago, and, the day before yesterday, left the apartment you now occupy for one in the Rue de Rivoli. She is the directress of an English theatre which opens its doors next week." Berlioz tells us:—

"I remained mute and palpitating at the news of this incredible chance, and this concurrence of fatal circumstances. I then saw well that for me no longer struggle was possible. For two years I was without news of the fair Ophelia; I knew not if she were in England, Scotland, or America, and I arrived from Italy at the moment when, returning from the north of Europe, she reappeared in Paris. And we had nearly met in the same house, and I occupied an apartment which she had just quitted."

This, however, was not the only indication that fate had willed the bringing together of the French musician and the English actress.

"Two days before that fixed for the concert which, as I thought, was a farewell to art and life, I was in Schlesinger's music-shop, when an Englishman entered, stayed a short time, and left. 'Who is that man?' said I to Schlesinger. 'That is Mr. Schutter, one of the editors of Galignani's Messenger.' 'Ah! I have an idea,' he added, striking his forehead. 'Give me a box, Schutter knows Miss Smithson; I will ask him to take your tickets to her and engage her to be present at the concert.' The proposal thrilled me from head to foot, but I had not the courage to refuse it, and I gave him the box. Schlesinger ran after Mr. Schutter, caught him, explained the interest which the presence of the actress would create at the concert, and obtained his promise to bring her if possible."

At that time Miss Smithson was not in the mood to concede every request, her theatrical enterprise having proved a failure. Nevertheless, to oblige Mr. Schutter she attended the concert, learning only when on the way to the Conservatoire who was the giver of it, and wholly unsuspecting of the fact that she was the heroine of the melodrame to be performed. From her box she saw Berlioz, and recognised him as her adorer of two years before. "That is surely he" she said to herself; "poor young man, he has forgotten me, no doubt. I hope so." During the entr'acte, after the "Symphonie Fantastique," some words were dropped in the lady's hearing which renewed her attention to the composer. "If he should love me still!" she murmured. Of this there could be no doubt when the actor Bocage recited the words of the melodrame, in which Lelio speaks pathetically of his lost Juliet-Ophelia; "Mon Dieu! Juliet! Ophelia! I can no longer doubt. He means myself. He loves me still!" The Hall seemed to spin round with the excited girl, and she returned home, as she was wont to say herself, with no more consciousness of the waking world than a sleepwalker. The next day Berlioz obtained permission to visit his beloved one, and his suit prospered notwithstanding the opposition of her mother and sister. But the lady's enterprise went from bad to worse, till at last the theatre closed, leaving Miss Smithson hopelessly in debt. Nor was this all. The poor girl, in stepping from her carriage to the pavement, slipped and broke her leg.

Now might Berlioz have shown himself a heartless man of the world. The star of his artist-love had set with the fickle Parisians; she herself lay on a bed of sickness, and a load of debt pressed her down. Did he leave her in this strait? To his honour, no. He exerted himself to get up a benefit concert, at which Liszt and Chopin played, and then—but let him speak for himself.

"Finally, in the summer of 1833, Henrietta Smithson being ruined and but half cured, I married her, despite the violent opposition of her family, and after having been myself obliged to resort to extremities with my parents. The day of our marriage she had nothing in the world but debts, and the dread that her accident had disabled her from playing again. On my part, I had only 300 francs, lent me by my friend Gounet, and I was once more out of favour at home."

All this, if not very wise, was very good and honourable on the part of Berlioz. Only he should not have told it with such an evident desire to pose as a hero in the circumstances. It would seem from a passage in a letter written to Hiller (July, 1833), that the course of Berlioz' love fulfilled a well-known proverb. We read:—

"You infer, no doubt, from the long and absurd silence I have kept towards you, that the state of liberty in which you left me did not last. Two days after you quitted Paris, Henrietta begged me instantly to go to her. I was cold and calm as a statue. She wrote to me two hours later; I went to her, and after a thousand protestations and explanations which, without completely justifying her, disculpated her at least on the principal point, I finished by pardoning her, and since then I have not left her side for a day."

In the same letter he touches upon his by no means roseate circumstances:—

"My poor Henrietta begins to walk a little. We have already been several times to the Tuileries together. I watch the progress of her cure with the anxiety of a mother looking on the first steps of her infant. But what a frightful position is ours! My father will give me nothing, hoping by that to prevent my marriage. She has nothing; I can do little or nothing for her; yesterday evening we passed two hours together drowned in tears. Under no pretext whatever can I make her accept the money I have to give. Happily, I have obtained from the fund for the encouragement of fine arts the sum of 1000 francs for her, and I am now sending it to her. It was waiting for this money, which I desired to send myself, that delayed my journey. As soon as possible, I start to obtain either from my father, my brother-in-law, my friends, or the money-lenders who know my father's fortune, some thousands of francs, which will enable me to extricate her as well as myself, from our present terrible position."

That in view of all this Berlioz had very gloomy thoughts he proves by continuing as follows: "As I know not how the matter will end, I beg you to preserve this letter, so that, should the worst happen, you will be able to claim all my manuscript music, which I leave and confide to you."

Very soon after marriage, Berlioz, having been relieved by the Government from the obligation, as Grand Prix, to spend a year in Germany, began to play what he calls "the painful rôle of beneficiaire," and organised a dramatic performance, followed by a concert. In the first, Madame Berlioz played a scene from "Hamlet," her husband noting, with cruel pain, that her freedom of movement had been destroyed by the accident. Moreover, all the applause of the public was reserved for another artist. "Poor Ophelia, thy sun declining!—I was in despair." As for the concert, it was a complete fiasco. By the then rules of the Théâtre Italien, the orchestra was not obliged to play after midnight, and on this occasion its members kept to the letter of their bond.

"While Weber's chorus was being sung these cowardly clowns, unworthy to be called musicians, slipped away. It was midnight. The other players, whom I paid, remained at their posts, and when I went up to begin the symphony I found myself surrounded by five violins, two violas, four basses and a trombone. I knew not what to do in my fright. The public showed no inclination to go away; they even began to be impatient and to demand the symphony. . . . At last, in the midst of the tumult, a voice cried from the balcony, 'The Marche aux supplices!' I answered, 'I cannot play the Marche aux supplices with five violins. It is not my fault; the orchestra has gone away. I hope that the public.' . . . I was flushed with shame and indignation. The audience then went away disappointed, the concert ended, and my enemies did not forget to say that my music put the musicians to flight."

The concert, nevertheless, brought in 7,000 francs, which sum immediately disappeared in the gulf of Madame Berlioz' debts. Hereupon the master resolved to try again, and give a concert at the Conservatoire with a more trustworthy orchestra. This proved a complete success. "Finally, to crown good fortune, a man, when the public had gone away—a man with long hair, piercing eyes, strange and ravaged (ravagée) face, a son of genius, a colossus among giants, whom I had never seen, and of whom the first sight troubled me profoundly, waited for me in the hall, stopped me to shake my hand, and crowded upon me burning eulogies which set me on fire both at heart and head. This was Paganini." A few weeks later Paganini called upon Berlioz and said, "I have a wonderful viola, an admirable Stradivarius, and I wish to play upon it in public. But I have no fitting music, and I am sure that you could provide it." In vain Berlioz protested that such a virtuoso should write for himself. "No, no, I insist," replied the great man. "You will succeed. As for me, I am suffering too much to compose, and could not dream of it." This was the origin of the symphony "Harold en Italie" with its viola solo, produced at the Conservatoire, November 23, 1834.

Men with decided character always make decided enemies, and we have seen against what opposition and intrigue Berlioz had sometimes to contend. Now, a fresh example presents itself. In 1836 the Minister of the Interior set apart an annual sum of 3,000 francs for the encouragement of sacred compositions, and resolved to begin by asking Berlioz to write a Mass. The master received unofficial news of this, and, overjoyed, at once sought an interview with M. Gasparin. "I am just leaving the Government," said the Minister, "and this measure will be my musical testament. You have received the order for the Requiem?" "No, sir, and it was only by chance that I heard of your good intentions towards me." "How can that be! I directed the order to be sent to you eight days ago. This is owing to the negligence of the office. I will see to it." But the fact was that the Director of Fine Arts, who did not like the Minister's project and loved Berlioz but little, had purposely kept back the order, hoping that, when M. Gasparin left the Government, the whole matter would drop. This mean trick failed, as it deserved to fail. On the very last day of office M. Gasparin sent for the Director, and, in severe terms, commanded him to forward the commission to Berlioz at once. Which was done. In revenge the master allows us to see how fitted the Director was for his post.

"This arbiter of the destinies of art condescended to recognise no value in any music save Rossini's. One day, however, after having in my presence passed under the saw of his disdainful appreciation all the ancient and modern masters of Europe, with the exception of Beethoven, whom he had forgotten, he bethought himself all at once and said, 'However, there is one of them, I think—his name is—what does he call himself?—a German, whose symphonies they play at the Conservatoire.' 'Beethoven?' 'Yes Beethoven. He is not without talent.' I myself heard the Director of Fine Arts say this. He admitted that Beethoven was not without talent."

The "Requiem" was composed in a fury of haste, Berlioz even adopting a sort of musical shorthand to catch up his crowding ideas, and, after a good deal of fuss and pother, it was performed at the Invalides in commemoration of the fall of Constantine. Habeneck conducted, and Berlioz deliberately charges him with trying to ruin the work, because at its most critical moment he laid down his bâton and took a pinch of snuff. "I had my eye upon him," says the master, "and in a moment, pivoting upon one foot, I threw myself before him, stretched out my arms, and marked the time of the new movement. The orchestra followed me in due order; I conducted the movement to its end, and the effect I desired was produced. When, at the last words of the chorus, Habeneck saw the 'Tuba mirum' saved, he said, 'What a cold sweat I was in! Without you we should have been lost.' 'Yes, I know it well,' I replied, looking at him steadily." Berlioz had great difficulty in obtaining the promised 2,000 francs for the expenses of performance, and still more in securing the 3,000 francs which were his by the terms of M. Gasparin's ordonnance. At last he would wait no longer.

"One morning I went to the Home Office, blue, pale with rage, resolved to make a row, resolved upon anything. On entering, I said to the Director, 'It decidedly appears that you will not pay me!' 'My dear Berlioz,' he answered, 'you know it is not my fault. I have taken all care, and made severe investigations. The money destined for you has disappeared, and gone somewhere else. I don't know in what office it is to be found. Ah! if such things happened in mine!' 'What! the funds destined for fine arts go out of your office without your knowing it! Your budget is then at the disposition of the first comer. But no matter. I am not going to trouble myself with such questions. A Requiem was ordered by the Minister of the Interior at the price of 3,000 francs; I must have 3,000 francs.' 'Mon Dieu! have a little patience. The matter shall be considered. Besides, there is talk of the Cross for you.' 'A fig for your Cross! Give me my money.' 'But—' 'There is no but,' I replied, upsetting a chair. 'I give you till to-morrow noon, and if at twelve o'clock precisely I have not received the amount, I will make a scandal with the Minister such as you have never experienced. You know that I am able to do it.' Upon this the Director, quite upset, and forgetting his hat, ran upstairs towards the Minister's room, I following and shouting, 'Tell him that I should be ashamed to treat my bootmaker as he is treating me, and that his conduct towards me will soon enjoy a rare celebrity.' This time I had found a crack in the Minister's armour. Ten minutes later the Director returned with 3,000 francs, taken from the chest of the Fine Arts Department. They had found the money."

THE list of contemporary composers mentioned in the Diary is headed by two of the most famous names in the history of English music—Lock and Purcell. In one of the earliest entries (February 21, 1660), before even the King had returned, one reads: "Here I met with Mr. Lock and Pursell, Masters of Musique, and with them to the Coffee House, into a room next the water by ourselves, where we spent an hour or two till Captain Taylor came and told us that the House had voted the gates of the City to be made up again, and the members of the City that are in prison to be set at liberty; and that Sir J. Booth's case be brought into the House to-morrow. Then we had variety of brave Italian and Spanish songs, and a canon for eight voices, which Mr. Lock had lately made, on these words, 'Domine salvum fac Regem,' an admirable thing. Here out of the window it was a most pleasant sight to see the City from one end to another with a glory about it, so high was the light of the bonfires, and so thick round the City, and the bells rang everywhere." The passage well illustrates the excited feeling of the time immediately preceding the Restoration. England, although nominally still a Commonwealth, was expecting the re-entry of the Stuarts, and Mr. Lock and other musicians were preparing hymns of triumph for the event. The connection between the divine art and the politics of the day was, however, not to be more fruitful of permanent results than it has been in other cases since. The history of the French Revolution, for example, may be followed step by step in the works of Cherubini, Méhul, and other contemporary composers, who sometimes had difficulty in keeping pace with the rapid changes of government. The same Grétry, whose "Richard, oh, mon roi, si l'univers t'abandonne" became the watchword of the Royalists, composed "Dénys le Tyran" and "La Fête de la Raison" to suit Republican tastes, was made a Knight of the Legion of Honour by Napoleon, and would, no doubt, have celebrated the restoration of the Bourbons had he lived a few months longer. And yet the most important and, with the exception of Méhul's "Chant du Départ," perhaps, only permanent addition to the national music of France was due to the amateur who wrote or, it may be, "adapted" the tune of the Marseillaise to his great hymn of liberty. Again, during the late Franco-German war, the far-famed composers of the most musical people in the world were unable to supply their armies with a better war-song than the trivial and hackneyed "Wacht am Rhein," written many years before. Musicians ought to profit by the lesson, and keep aloof from the turmoil and strife of politics. The songs wanted by the people have been, with few exceptions, supplied by the people. But this by the way.

To return to the Coffee House in the City, the first of the two English masters mentioned by Pepys is, of course, the famous Mathew Lock, of whom it would be superfluous in this place to say more than that he was rewarded for his loyal effusions—including some music "for ye King's sagbutts and cornets," played during Charles's progress to Whitehall—by being made Composer in Ordinary to His Majesty. He appears frequently in the Diary, and seems to have been well-versed in the affairs of State. It is, for example, from him that Mr. Pepys receives the first information of the substance of the letter "that went from Monk to the Parliament" in February, 1660, "denouncing Lambert and Vane, and many members now in the House, that were of the late tyrannical Committee of Safety."

The Purcell who made up the musical trio at the Coffee House is, in the notes of Lord Braybrooke's edition, associated with Lock as "both celebrated composers"; the obvious inference being that Henry Purcell the younger, in fact, the Purcell, is intended; and one is sorry to see that the Rev. Mynors Bright mechanically reprints the implied misunderstanding. For it need scarcely be added that the great English master was in 1660 two years of age, and that the "Pursell" of the Diary is obviously his father, who, although a clever musician, and subsequently one of the Gentlemen of the Chapel Royal, can scarcely be called a "celebrated composer." The real Purcell Pepys does not seem to have known; he is at least not mentioned in the Diary. This is the more strange as Pepys was intimately acquainted with both Captain Cocke and Pelham Humfrey, the successive masters of Purcell. The Captain is continually turning up in the Diary, and Humfrey is the subject of several more or less complimentary passages which all belong to the year 1667, and may be cited in their chronological order. It should be remembered that Humfrey, who seems to have been a particular favourite of Charles II., had been sent by him on an artistic tour to France and Italy, for which purpose he drew from the Secret Service fund sums to the amount of £450. He stayed abroad for three years, living mostly in Paris, where he studied under Lully. He had just returned home when he was introduced to Mr. Pepys, and disgusted that gentleman by his foreign ways and vanities. As Humfrey was at the time twenty years old, the epithet "little fellow" applied to him must refer to his stature.

"To Chapel," Mr. Pepys writes, November 1, 1667, "it being All-Hallows day, and heard a fine anthem made by Pelham, who is come over" (i.e. from Paris; he had returned in the previous October).

A fortnight afterwards we find that Mr. Pepys, the patron of art and artists, has asked the young musician to a dinner-party, at which the reader, if he likes, may be present.

"November 15, 1667.—Home, and then find, as I expected, Mr. Caesar and little Pelham Humphreys, lately returned from France, and is an absolute Monsieur, as full of form and confidence and vanity, and disparages everything and everybody's skill but his own. But to hear how he laughs at all the King's musick here, at Blagrove and others, that they cannot keep time nor tune nor understand anything; and that Grebus, the Frenchman, the King's master of the musick, how he understands nothing, nor can play on any instrument, and so cannot compose; and that he will give him a lift out of his place; and that he and the King are mighty great! I had a good dinner for them, as a venison pasty and some fowl; and after dinner we did play, he on the theorbo, Mr. Caesar on his French lute, and I on the viol, and I see that this Frenchman do so much wonders on the theorbo that without question he is a good musician, but his vanity do offend me."

Whether Humfrey succeeded in lifting Grebus out of his place, is more than the present writer has thought it necessary to find out. Certain it is that the pushing young man made his way in the world. From a gentleman in the Chapel Royal he rose to the post of Master of the Children, succeeding his master, Captain Cocke, who, according to one account, "died of discontent at his pupil's excelling him."

The day after the dinner Mr. Pepys goes "to White Hall, where there is to be a performance of musick of Pelham's before the King. The company not come; but I did go into the musick-room where Captain Cocke and many others, and here did I hear the best and the smallest organ that ever I saw in my life, and such a one as, by the grace of God, I will have next year if I continue in this condition, whatever it cost me." Being tired of waiting, Mr. Pepys takes a walk with his old friend Mr. Gregory; from whom, more suo, he gathers all manner of information and court scandal. After an hour he returns just in time to see and draw a picture for us of Humfrey conducting his own music before the Court: "Got into the theatre room and there heard both the vocall and instrumentall musick, where the little fellow stood keeping time; but for my part, I see no great matter in both sorts of music."

The honoured name of Gibbons does not gain in the Diary the prominence one might expect to see it assigned there. Orlando had passed away long before Pepys began to write, but his son Dr. Christopher seems to have been well known to the diarist. In the early part of the work he is once or twice briefly referred to amongst the friends of Lord Sandwich as "Mr. Gibbons." Later on his degree obtained in 1664 is duly given him. We have previously met him where Mr. Pepys inspects an organ at Westminster Abbey. Once again we catch a passing glimpse of him being carried to the "Sun Taverne" in King Street, "and there I made him and some friends of him drink." And this is all we hear of Gibbons.*

The name of Thomas Ravenscroft does not occupy a very prominent position in the history of art. At the same time readers interested in early Church music may like to know what Mr. Pepys thought of him. There are two references to him in the Diary. On November 27, 1664 (a Sunday), we learn that "in the evening came Mr. Andrews and Hill, and we sung with my boy, Ravenscroft's 4-part psalms, most admirable musique." A few Sundays afterwards we find the same good company assembled, the place of the boy being this time supplied by a "tolerable pretty woman"; again the psalms of Ravenscroft are the object of their musical efforts, the result arrived at being less favourable to the composer than on the previous occasion. And here, again, the moderation of Pepys's critical language deserves honourable mention. But perhaps it will be better to quote the entire passage, which at the same time will convey to the reader an idea of how Mr. Pepys and other good people used to spend their Sundays, combining decorous enjoyment with the fulfilment of religious duty, and feasting their eyes on pretty women and gorgeous footmen while their ears listened to edifying discourses.

"Dec. 11, 1664. (Lord's Day.) To church alone in the morning. In the afternoon to the French Church, where much pleased with the three sisters of the parson, very handsome, especially in their noses, and sing prettily. I hear a good sermon of the old man touching duty to parents. Here was Sir Samuel Morland† and his lady, very fine, with two footmen in new liverys (the church taking much notice of them), and going into their coach after sermon with great gazing. So I home, and my cozen, Mary Pepys's husband, comes after me, and told me that out of the money he received some months since he did receive 18d. too much, and did now come and give it me, which was very pretty. So home, and there found Mr. Andrews and his lady, a well-bred and a tolerable pretty woman, and by and by Mr. Hill, and to singing, and then to supper and to sing again, and so good night. It is a little strange how these Psalms of Ravenscroft, after two or three times singing, prove but the same again, though good. No diversity appearing at all almost." Ravenscroft belonged to an earlier generation of musicians, and Mr. Pepys might well find his style a trifle monotonous, compared with the Italian and French songs he was wont to listen to. But apart from this, and looking upon Ravenscroft, in connection with the writers of his own time, the modest censure of the diarist will not be found without some show of reason. Thomas Ravenscroft was a theorist and pedant of the deepest dye, as the very title of his absurd attempt at reviving obsolete practices of bygone days, is sufficient to show. Here it is: "A Briefe Discourse of the True (but neglected) use of charact'ring the Degrees by their Perfection, Imperfection, and Diminution in Mensurable Musicke against the Common Practise and Custome of these times; Examples whereof are exprest in the Harmony of 4 Voyces concerning the Pleasure of 5 usuall Recreations: 1, Hunting; 2, Hawking; 3, Dancing; 4, Drinking; 5, Enamouring."

* The supposition of the Rev. Mynors Bright that the "Mr." Gibbons is Orlando is, of course, a mistake; neither does it appear why he should be a different person from the subsequent "Dr."

† Samuel Morland successively scholar and fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge, and Mr. Pepys's tutor there, became afterwards one of Thurloe's under-secretaries, and was employed in several embassies by Cromwell (e.g., to the Duke of Savoy to protest against the cruelties inflicted on the Vaudois), whose interests he betrayed by secretly communicating with Charles II. In consideration of these services he was created a baronet after the Restoration. He was an ingenious mechanic, supposed by some persons to have invented the steam-engine, and lived to an advanced age.

More important is the part played in the Diary by another minor English musician, Thomas Blagrave, the same whom, as we have seen, Pelham Humfrey abused in unmeasured terms. He was an intimate friend and gossip of Mr. Pepys, who esteemed him as a "sober, politique man." The relations of the two were indeed of old standing, and included some monetary obligations, incurred at a period when Mr. Pepys's fortunes had not as yet emerged from under the cloud of adversity. As early as March, 1660, we read the entry: "From thence homewards, and called at Mr. Blagrave's, where I took up my note that he had of mine for 40s., which he two years ago did give me as a pawn while he had my lute." Again, in June of the same year, Mr. Blagrave "went home with me, and did give me a lesson upon the flageolet, and handselled my silver can with my wife and me." After this Mr. Blagrave disappears for some time from the Diary, till April, 1662, when he is discovered in company with "a pretty kinswoman that sings," who, after another interval of two years, "is to come and live with my wife." Times and the respective positions of the two men had changed since the day when Pepys was glad to borrow forty shillings on good security. Thomas Blagrave, it may be added, was a Gentleman of the Royal Chapel and a cornet-player of repute. He also was a composer of some merit.

The name in the list of English musicians to which we should now have to turn is that of Lawes, a name too important to be introduced at the end of an article, and which, therefore, must be held over till next month.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

In the present article we propose to follow Dvorák into some of the higher manifestations of his art. With this purpose in view it is well high immaterial which of his greater works we take up, and accident rather than choice opens before us his Trio in G minor (Op. 26), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, which does not appear to have been yet performed in this country. The first Allegro presents to our view a remarkable example of the condensation of thought and economy of material already pointed out as characteristic of the composer. It begins with a formal exordium containing, in the rough, so to speak, the ideas that go to make the principal theme. They occupy no more than three bars—from which the subject is evolved:—

The violin counterpoint in this citation is quoted for a purpose which will soon appear; meanwhile, let us note that the development of the subject occupies nearly two pages of the score without the introduction of a single new thought. Dvorák, it must be allowed, sometimes pushes this expansive process to a risky extreme. Not so, however, in the present case, since he is able to make large use of a combination of two figures—which pursued through a sequence of keys carries the development triumphantly along. The second subject, it will be seen, is distinctly suggested by the violin passage (Ex. 2) in accompaniment to the first. The ear is beguiled with the idea that the theme has been heard before, and nothing could more naturally occur, especially as it is attended by the most prominent "figure" of the precedent melody:—

Beyond these materials the movement—a fully developed one—contains absolutely nothing that can in any sense be styled important, save one broad theme (poco meno mosso) which leads to the reprise— and this is easily recognised as substantially a part of the chief melody "augmented." Of what are known as "episodes" there are none—a sufficiently remarkable thing at a time when, through lack of constructive and developing power, episodes are much in vogue.

In the Largo Dvorák is even more chary of thematic resources, the entire movement springing from one small germ:—

The expansion is undoubtedly clever in a high degree, but we are disposed to look upon it as an example of the danger composers run when too confident of their power in this regard. Continual repetition of, or reference to, such short phrases must inevitably weary, above all in a slow movement, where the mind is not entertained by rapid progress and exhilarating motion. In the remaining movements Dvorák is less reticent, and we shall quote only the leading theme of the Scherzo as an illustration of the composer's inventive power when simple, yet characteristic, melodies are concerned:—

The rhythm is ten-bar, and, as a matter of course, the Trio reverts to the ordinary eight-bar, with graceful and grateful effect.

Turning to a Trio in B flat (Op. 21) for the same instruments, and to its leading movement, we find Dvorák in the mood to expend his melodic wealth with a more liberal hand. Besides the principal theme—

a formal episode appears—followed by one of a more incidental character leading up to the second subject:—

Then comes the second subject itself:—

Here the thematic material is undoubtedly rich and abundant, but the composer is not thereby tempted into diffuseness. He recognises the truth propounded by William Penn, "Form is good, but not formality," and keeps himself sternly within the laws of symmetry and well-ordered sequence. The slow movement (Adagio molto e mesto) corresponds with its predecessor as to the feature we have noticed, and may be looked at also for its free harmonic treatment. The opening bars are significant:—

After a full close in D flat minor, an instant change to A major occurs, and the second part begins in strong contrast:—

Further on, we meet with a characteristic example of the fashion in which Dvorák sometimes takes a few notes here and a few there—not necessarily from his chief themes—and uses them in combination:—

The notes for violin in the first of these bars will be recognised as part of the second subject (Ex. 13).

We turn naturally to Dvorák's music for stringed instruments in search of proof that he possesses the power of polyphonic writing. One of the best works, if not the absolute best, on this score is the Quartet in E flat (Op. 51), which has been heard on several occasions at the Monday Popular Concerts. Here we soon meet with examples. The following occurs in the first part of the opening Allegro—

and a further specimen invites attention in the finale:—

Proofs might be multiplied indefinitely, since, as a matter of fact this easy mastery of theme weaving, and the command of counterpoint involved in it, are among Dvorák's best qualities. It is often exceedingly interesting to observe the skilful manner in which he deals with the threads of his discourse; never seeming at a loss, nor failing to make them fall harmoniously into the general design.

Turning to our composer's manner of developing his themes, those used in the first movement of his Sestet in A major offer themselves for remark. The leading subject runs thus—and its first bud appears when the group in bar three suggests the following tentatively, so to speak:—

It is approved, and takes a definite melodic form, with an important counterpoint—which soon after appears clothed with the dignity of a separate subject, having presently a counterpoint of its own. Meanwhile the descending passage just quoted reappears with its notes equalised, and with this a new resource reaches the composer's hands. He, for example, inverts the progression and uses it contrapuntally with the fresh theme—immediately varying it thus:—

At the opening of the "free fantasia," the new counterpoint of quavers plays a distinguished part in attendance on both themes. Now, however, its character changes:—

Upon these groups of four ascending notes the composer at once seizes with avidity, and passes them from instrument to instrument in pleasant and sportive imitation. Presently he reverts to the leading subject, touches it with his magic wand, and transforms it thus—for purposes of double counterpoint with the second theme. This leads to the reprise.

It is unnecessary to give further evidence of the thoughtful and artistic manner—the manner of great masters—in which Dvorák deals with his thematic material. In his case there is no scraping together of ideas from all parts of the compass to eke out a movement. Generally, it will be found that any given section of his works in sonata form has its germ in one or two principal subjects, out of which diversified forms are evolved with the ease and beauty of a natural process. This is the supreme test, not of imagination perhaps, but certainly of art.

Our subject is a tempting one to pursue, and the field is large, but examples need not be multiplied, and it may suffice to notice one more work—the overture to a comic opera, "Der Bauer ein Schelm" (Op. 37). Here we meet with Dvorák in his characteristic mood. The overture begins with a short Andante maestoso, in which clashing rhythms crowd closely on each other, with odd effect. We will transcribe the entire melody,—it is simply harmonised for full orchestra:—

The rhythm of the opening bars is indicated by trumpets and horns through a succession of passages obviously intended, while creating expectancy, to puzzle and confuse with reference to what may be expected. Snatches of tunes are heard here and there in the orchestra, as this—and this—

while the violins are partial to an arpeggio:—

So long does the composer linger among these vague and possibly misleading things that we grow impatient. At last, however, he dashes into his Allegro, and then it is found that the violins, with their little arpeggio, were the true prophets:—

The second subject is not less frank and joyous—

but, after awhile, its rocking motion becomes slower and then stops altogether, as the Andante, with its varied rhythm, returns, this time ornamented by flowing passages of demi-semiquavers for the violins, which presently attend it, also, with an independent and strongly-contrasted theme. The Andante is worked out at some length, before the Allegro returns, and is again heard in the original form as a prelude to the Coda, in which the first theme of the Allegro assumes prominence. To the best of our knowledge this inspiring and capital overture has not yet been played in England, but we venture to say that, when heard, it will stimulate a desire to know more of Dvorák's orchestral works outside the limited sphere of Slavonic Rhapsodies and such like.

In conclusion, has it not appeared from the rapid and superficial examination now ended that Dvorák is a well-ordered composer, though imaginative and bold? He is not one of those who ride Pegasus without a bridle, and allow the winged horse to fly whither he will in the realms of space. On the contrary, Dvorák, while not the slave of rule and method, submits to those laws of his art which have come down to him sanctified by the allegiance of all the great sons of music. To such men—progressive yet conservative—we must look, and for their "long continuance and increasing" we should hope and pray.

"PAST HOURS."*

MANY years ago, when—to the young men of the day at least—poetry was represented by Byron and music by Rossini, the small number of dissenters from the prevailing faith had but few opportunities of stating their convictions; for to be out of the fashion was considered eccentric, and it always saves trouble when we seem to sail with the stream. Music—with which our journal is immediately concerned—meant the Opera, the Opera meant the Italian Opera, and Italian Opera meant the works of Rossini and his imitators; so that persons desirous of hearing compositions of a different school of writing were compelled to seek them at the very few concerts of classical music which were then given, or to organise performances in their own houses. Those, however, who have lived through that time to the present find that the music which was fashionable in their young days no longer rules the hour; and that the so-called lovers of the lyrical drama who regard Italian Opera and Italian singing as it used to be regarded are now decidedly in the minority. It can scarcely be wondered at, then, that this minority occasionally speaks out, and endeavours to prove to the rising generation that what is believed to be development is, in fact, but decadence of the art. So long as these complaints are uttered by private individuals in conversation, or scattered through the ephemeral literature of the day, but small attention may be given to them; but when they are put forth in two volumes written by an artist, and that artist one who by her charming vocalisation in the very music she so much admires has earned a fame which lives in the memory even after her decease, we feel that we are bound to listen. We need scarcely remind our readers that the authoress of the work under notice is one of a gifted family almost every member of which has obtained a world-wide celebrity. Adelaide Kemble—as we still delight to call her—by reason perhaps of her true artistic nature, rather than of her commanding vocal qualifications, achieved so marked a success on the operatic stage as to attract all London to her performances; and those who have a vivid recollection of her Norma will assuredly agree with us in our high estimate of her powers. After her short career on the stage, as Mrs. Sartoris her name often appeared in literature; her house became the resort of the most eminent literary and artistic men of the day; and in the preface to the book before us her daughter speaks of the "pleasant memories of happy hours passed in the company of one whose large sympathies and greatness of soul never failed to attract and bring out all that was best and most noble in every one who approached her." That music was her passion is evident by the collection of stories and sketches in "Past Hours," all of which—with the exception of "Judith"—have before appeared in print; but, as we have already hinted, it is (as far as Operas, at least, are referred to) the music of the Italian school to which she clings, curiously enough, however, excepting the compositions of Verdi. It may indeed be said by many who desire to read the works of so accomplished a writer for their purely literary merit that the subject of music occasionally appears somewhat dragged in; for even in "Medusa" and "Judith," neither of which in reality need have anything whatever to do with the art, both the concert-room and the Opera are prominently brought forward; in the former tale the hero meeting the mysterious Medusa at a concert in St. James's Hall, and in the latter one of the principal characters being killed by her inexorable patron, who, in consequence of her having a sympathetic voice and strong poetical feeling, forces her upon the stage, having made up his mind that she shall be a prima donna. But although the authoress thus shows her wish to give a musical colour even to her more important stories, she is also determined that her opinions shall be definitely put forth; and accordingly, in the "Recollections of the Life of Joseph Heywood, and some of his Thoughts about Music," and also in "Madame de Monferrato," she speaks out pretty freely about the music of the time. Joseph Heywood certainly mentions the delight he experienced in his youthful days when listening to the compositions of "Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, and old Corelli"; but in operatic music he evidently especially admires the works of Rossini and Bellini. When given a box at the Opera he says, "I remembered very distinctly the Italian music I had heard years ago—the brilliant effects and grand finish of Rossini, the agreeable vein of melody, somewhat poorly worked out, but always charming in sentiment, of Bellini—and I hoped to have all these delightful recollections delightfully revived." But this is what he heard: "I only know that there was a husband and wife who bawled a hideous duet at each other, with the veins in their throats swollen till I thought they would burst, and their eyes starting out of their heads at their own screams—and a mother who bawled because she had wanted to burn somebody else's baby, and then by a very unaccountable mistake, had put her own baby on the fire instead; and then there was a man with the most extraordinary lungs I ever heard who bawled for an hour together at the same pitch because his mother was going to be burned." And he afterwards speaks of a little lull at the conclusion, "where the lady who has burned the children goes to sleep, and therefore is obliged to cease bawling for a few seconds; and there were two pretty romances sung in lucid intervals by the tenor, one at the beginning, and the other at the end, when he is shut up in a tower." As this is evidently a criticism upon "Il Trovatore," we may conclude what is our authoress's opinion of Verdi; although we trust that she did not forget, when she thus speaks through Mr. Heywood, how in her own favourite part of Norma she "bawled" because she wanted to stab two babies, and assuredly the tenor also "bawls" pretty roundly, although perhaps not "for an hour together," because his wife is going to be burned. In "Madame de Monferrato" the same feelings for Italians and Italian music is expressed. "When I was singing," says the ex-prima donna, "to that silent London public, so well bred, so inanimate, so respectable, and so oppressive, how I remember longing for my beloved Italians, who would have pelted me for a false note, but who would take the horses out of the carriage and draw it home themselves in triumph after a great success; people who really cared, and made you really care, for what you did." We can well forgive, and even deeply sympathise with, the authoress of this book for lingering over the days when the Italian Opera was at least a reality, especially as we remember that her greatest success was achieved in the music of Bellini on the lyrical stage. But the excessive literary merit displayed in "Past Hours" almost makes us regret that she should force upon critics the necessity of discussing the value of her musical opinions. When, for example, Joseph Heywood speaks of "Callcott's and Horsley's charming glees," it must be remembered that the "part-song" has to a great extent superseded these somewhat artificial effusions; and in expressing his regret that tenors cannot now execute the ultra-florid music of Rossini and Bellini, he forgets to ask whether such compositions are now in demand. Our readers will see that we have been compelled, from circumstances, to discuss the weaker part of Mrs. Sartoris's book; but the charm of her style and truthful delineation of character cannot fail to ensure for "Past Hours" a large circle of admirers.

* "Past Hours." By Adelaide Sartoris (Adelaide Kemble). Richard Bentley and Son.

H. C. L.

IN Douglas Jerrold's drama, "Black-eyed Susan," when the crew of the ship to which the hero belongs give evidence as to his good qualities in the trial scene, one of his messmates informs the court that he "plays the fiddle like an angel." Now, although we may reasonably doubt whether a common sailor can arrive at such an ideal state of perfection as this, it can readily be understood that even a tolerably skilled violinist would be certain of an attentive audience after a day's hard work at sea. Whether this would equally apply on land, or whether the talent of the player was not up to the required standard, we cannot say; but in the account of a visit to the "Old Men's Ward" of a workhouse, recently published in a morning contemporary, an old pauper who amused himself, and tried to amuse others, with his violin, seems to have created but little sympathy amongst his companions. When his "old lady" died, he told the visitor at the workhouse, he took up his violin, and felt such an "in—spi—ration" that in less than a month he could play "a'most anything on it." Being reproved for being ambitious enough to perform operatic airs, he burst out with pardonable artistic energy: "Talk about me," he said, "playing quiet little tunes, sir, I can't do it. I should be unworthy of the gift if I tried to do it. They laugh at me when I tell 'em so, but when I get the bow in my hand, sir, and get a bit warm, it's like grasping a sword in a manner of speaking, and I seem to be fighting and overcoming all my enemies." It is evident, however, that he did not overcome his enemies in the workhouse, for the number of complaints of his performance had driven the poor old fellow almost mad. "There isn't one of 'em that has got any more ear for music than a kangaroo," he said in one of his fits of temper; and, indeed, at least in his actions, he seems to have rivalled Hogarth's "Enraged Musician," for he had already hit one of the old men over the head with his violin, and "knocked him off the form." It is sad to think that the only consolation of this pauper's declining years should inflict such misery upon those around him; but it is evident that even paupers take the liberty of defining the difference between noise and music, and will insist upon it that the "Old Men's Ward" shall be ruled by Bentham's maxim, "the greatest happiness of the greatest number."

A SHORT time ago we were informed by the principal of an eminent firm that the art of cutting glass to such perfection as we occasionally see in the drops of old chandeliers is completely lost. Persons now, he said, like showy articles that will look well in a drawing-room; and although they must be good of their kind, their possessors care not to hand them down from generation to generation as portions of the family property: in other words, expensive and highly elaborate glass-cutting "won't pay." Now this is, of course, a very good mercantile reason why work should be comparatively of an inferior character; but as it is of the utmost importance that specimens of the skill and talent of our forefathers should be kept before us, let us do honour to those enthusiasts in the cause whose monetary necessities do not compel them to think so much of what the people want as what they ought to have. Viewed in this light, then, the many Amateur Musical Societies which have recently grown around us chiefly for the purpose of making the public acquainted with the grand but neglected creations of the composers who have passed away, are deserving of the highest encouragement. Mr. Joseph Barnby's Choir, Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, the Bach Society, the London Musical Society, and several others, including some excellent Suburban Associations, have already made us familiar with compositions of the existence of which many music-lovers, even, were not previously aware. In these we may study the art-workmanship of a day when men toiled for the honour and glory of their calling; and even if we see no necessity for throwing our thoughts into the idiom of the time, or even of cultivating the profound contrapuntal knowledge displayed in their compositions, let us at least take a lesson from their pure artistic enthusiasm. Carlyle said that in the present day "Art is wielding a feeble, watery pencil." May we not, by comparison with the work of the past, endeavour to ascertain whether there is really any truth in this assertion.

SAD results often follow when a clever theorist suddenly resolves to become practical. Many persons, for example, have poetically associated musical sounds with colours—even going so far as to assert that a certain note invariably suggests a certain colour—and we all know the story of the blind man who invariably coupled the sound of a trumpet with scarlet. From America now comes the news that a resident of the backwoods has resolved to make some tangible use of this idea by constructing a "colour organ." Thus, we are told "when C was depressed a flood of red light was thrown upon a ground glass screen suspended above the organ. Running up the scale, the colours appeared in the following order: red, orange red, orange, orange yellow, yellow, yellow green, green, bluish green, blue, violet blue, violet, violet red, and red again." The apparatus, it appeared, was simple in construction, "the pressing of a key uncovering a hole from which the sunlight streamed through a bit of coloured glass upon the screen." To test the inventor's assertion that beauty in music would be reflected by a corresponding beauty in colour, the narrator of the tale says, "I played a few chords; the effect was pretty. I then played some atrocious discords; the effect was just as pretty." This was certainly somewhat unfortunate; but still the ingenious maker of the instrument expressed his earnest conviction that by means of it the deaf could be made to appreciate the beauties of Beethoven's Symphonies. When, however, we are told by the person who had already produced the "pretty effects" upon the organ that he "could distinguish no difference between the combinations of colours produced by playing 'Home, sweet home,' or sitting on the keyboard," we fear that we cannot hold out much hope to the deaf that the subtle beauties of Beethoven's works will be revealed to the eye. It is a pity that the enthusiasm of the clever designer of this "colour organ" should prevent his seeing that, after all his labour, he has only manufactured a pleasing toy.

THERE can be no doubt that the modern "Analytical Programme" of a Classical Concert has taught people to think upon the form and structure of the works they are hearing; and although some may be too technical for the general reader, enough information may usually be gleaned from them to make the music infinitely more interesting to a mixed audience. But then it is absolutely necessary that those who undertake to prepare these programmes should know something about what they are writing upon; for even the least-informed persons must think it an impertinence when instruction is thrust upon them by those who are evidently as ignorant of the matter as themselves. The following specimen of musical "Analysis," however, will sufficiently prove that such critics are still living and flourishing. It is extracted from the programme of a concert of Chamber Music, and relates to Beethoven's Sonata in E, for pianoforte: "The theme is a connected flow, flowing back when it is varied: The second one is very delicate, but not flowing in one wave like the other. The Allegretto is a bearable tragedy—not deep or painful: it comes to the surface with incisive notes, but not often. The second part is its relief, or sleep, and it ends in the same strain. The Rondo follows. It has a slightly feverish life; its episodes and variations are of an unstable or capricious nature, except one in G, which is decided, but there is no return to that key." In Punch, some few years back, we remember to have read a "Guide to Bradshaw's Guide," in which an attempt was made to explain a few of the mysteries of that somewhat enigmatical publication. On the same principle it would be good, we think, for the writer of the passage we have quoted to issue a "key" to his analytical programme.

A LONG letter headed "Music in England," which appeared in the Times of the 25th ult., signed "C. A. P. D.," calls attention to the increase of the stall prices at the Royal Italian Opera to 25s.; and truly, as we think, assigns as a cause for this alteration the prevalence of the "star" system, which compels lessees to pay extravagant terms to a few artists. The writer (a lady) proceeds to demonstrate the necessity of appealing to a higher class of listeners than can be found as a rule either at Operas or concerts where "stars" are the attraction, and suggests that a fund should be formed by wealthy lovers of music to enable persons duly qualified to undertake high-class concerts for the public benefit at cheap prices, the performers to be guaranteed from loss, and also ensured a moderate scale of remuneration. The scheme is assuredly worth consideration; but as those who can afford to subscribe to this fund can also afford to attend musical performances at extravagant prices, it becomes a question whether they sufficiently sympathise with their poorer—but no less art-loving—brothers and sisters to procure for them a pleasure which they have so long considered one of the privileges of their order.

WE should be very glad to know whether there is a journal called the Musical Review, because we have frequently read quotations from its columns, and yet have never met with it. The latest extract we have seen is appended to the advertisement of a song entitled "The Dream of Pilate's Wife," and it runs as follows: "Mr. Weatherly's treatment of the subject is masterly, and the music, by Mr. Levey, is worthy of Gounod." This is indeed warm praise; but as we have never yet heard of a single person who is aware of the existence of the publication in question, we fear that if only the readers of the criticism become purchasers of the song the sale will be somewhat limited.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE season at this establishment commenced on the 19th ult. with Verdi's Opera "Aida." Mdlle. Reszké, who made her first appearance on the occasion in the part of the heroine, showed so much intelligence and dramatic feeling as partially to compensate for certain defects rather of style than of voice, which occasionally marred some of her best efforts. Especially in the upper part of her register the notes sound harsh, as if unduly forced; but much of her singing in the subdued portions of the Opera was natural and thoroughly sympathetic with the words. Another début was that of M. Vergnet in the arduous part of Radames. The new-comer has an agreeable light tenor voice, which has been well trained; and when we say that he sings well, nothing can be added in his praise; for not only he displays no histrionic power, but it appears as if he scarcely considered any such display necessary. He phrases well, however, and treads the stage like an experienced artist. Madame Scalchi, as Amneris, Signor Cotogni, as Amonasro, and Signor Silvestri, as Ramfis, were thoroughly efficient; and the mounting of the Opera was in every respect so perfect as to give in many parts a factitious importance to the music. The first appearance this season of Madame Sembrich attracted a large audience on the 23rd ult. The Opera was "Lucia di Lammermoor," the heroine of which is so well suited to exhibit the exceptionally fine qualities of Madame Sembrich's voice that her entire performance was a series of triumphs. Her singing in the mad scene was so admirable as to elicit an enthusiastic encore for the scena, with flute obbligato (excellently played by Mr. Radcliff), and the sestet in the second act gained so much in effect by her exquisite vocalisation that the latter portion had to be repeated. In the part of Enrico Signor Sante Athos made a successful début, singing the whole of his music with much intelligence, and evidencing the possession of a voice of good compass and power. Signor Marini was a highly efficient Edgardo, and Signor Silvestri, as Raimondo, and Signor Corsi, as Arturo, were also thoroughly satisfactory. Signor Bevignani was an able Conductor on both the occasions under notice.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

SOON after the production of Mr. Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" at the Leeds Festival, it was understood that something like a gala performance of that work would be given at Kensington Gore, under the auspices of Royalty. Rumour even spoke of likelihood that the Queen herself would attend on the occasion, as a mark of supreme favour to a musician whom her family have long delighted to honour. In this respect, however, report went beyond the truth. Her Majesty was not present on the 7th ult. in the building named after her illustrious Consort, but the Prince of Wales with some other members of the Royal House were, and the performance thus enjoyed a special distinction which Mr. Sullivan, no doubt, regarded as a crowning act of regard for himself and his "dramatic cantata." The rendering of the work was as nearly as possible a repetition of that at Leeds: It had the disadvantage of a far larger area, and the chorus, if more numerous and equally well-trained, was not so sonorous as the famous West Riding body, but the soloists were the same, and Mr. Sullivan himself conducted. Under these circumstances success was as nearly assured as possible, and resulted in due course. So much has been said respecting the new Cantata that our readers will thank us for sparing them further remarks. They are by this time convinced that, though the work is unequal—strong in its lyrical, weak in its dramatic numbers—it contains more pleasant, graceful, and artistic music than the world will willingly let die. The series of Pagan choruses alone, particularly that which comes first, suffice to command respectful attention, and a recognition of value, as well from the connoisseur as from the uncultured listener. With all its faults, the "Martyr of Antioch" is a notable addition to English music, and whatever practical homage can be rendered in acknowledgment is, so far, its due. Concerning the efforts of the soloists at the "commanded" performance, it will suffice to say that the Leeds standard was duly attained by each and all; while the choruses, safe in the hands of the excellent choir associated with the building, could hardly have been given with more spirit and delicacy. In fine, the apotheosis of the "Martyr of Antioch," if so its recognition by royalty and social distinction may be called, took place under circumstances of which no one connected with it had reason to be ashamed.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

HANDEL'S "Samson" was the Oratorio performed by this Society in St. James's Hall on the 8th ult., and, as usual, the immediate successor of the "Messiah," drew a large audience. "Samson" has been for years past, if not throughout the Society's existence, one of the strongest items in its repertory. The reason is not obscure. It contains some of the old master's very best music—the very best of that which he wrote, not for a passing occasion merely, but for all time. This may be owing, in part, to the fact that in the libretto Handel found, for once, something like poetry, and experienced the stimulus of a sister art, instead of being depressed by mere rhymes and jingles. Under such circumstances, he always rose to the level of his theme. Hence in "Samson" we have undying masterpieces like "O first created beam," "Then round about the starry throne," "Total eclipse," and "Let the bright seraphim," with its magnificent choral pendant. For these alone an audience might be expected to gather, to say nothing of "Fixed in His everlasting seat," "With thunder armed," "Honour and arms," "Return, O God of hosts," and other gems of almost equal value. That the crowd assembled in St. James's Hall were well pleased need hardly be insisted upon. The performance, conducted by Sir M. Costa, was among the best in our experience of the Society's doings, the ensemble being throughout excellent in a high degree. All the performers knew their work, were pleased with it, did their best, and their best was very good. Particular mention was deserved by the soloists. The bright voice of Miss Annie Marriott told well in Delilah's music, and her rendering of "Let the bright seraphim" (trumpet, Mr. T. Harper) would certainly have provoked an encore had it come earlier in the evening. This young lady, we may say, bids fair for a high place among oratorio singers. Madame Patey was matchless as ever in the contralto airs; her delivery of "Return, O God of hosts," being a model of pure, unaffected devotional singing. The grand voice of Mr. Maas went far, in "Total eclipse," to atone for an obvious lack of feeling. In other solos, particularly "Thus when the sun," there was no need for such atonement, the artist being fully up to his work. Mr. F. King, as Manoah, and Mr. Bridson, as Harapha, contributed largely to the general excellence, upon the nature and extent of which we may congratulate the Society in warm terms.

Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed on Friday evening last.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE series of Crystal Palace Concerts came to a close on the 23rd ult., when a fine performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was given. It has become a custom to end the season with this great work, and a better could not well be chosen for the purpose. If there is any truth in the old proverb, "Finis coronat opus," the directors of the Crystal Palace may well look back with satisfaction on the season's work brought to an appropriate close at the last concert. It is not our present purpose to give a summary of the results of the season, but we must say that as far as excellence of execution is concerned, Mr. Manns's orchestra has not in any way forfeited its claims to being called one of the finest instrumental bodies in the world, neither has the high artistic aim evinced by the composition of the programmes been lost sight of for a moment. The same catholicity of taste which almost from the beginning of these Concerts made them a representative institution has also been maintained, and the works of all schools of music, classic and modern, have met with due attention. Guided by the analytical programmes of Mr. George Grove, intelligent listeners might here pass through a perfect course of musical history, and be instructed while they were aware only of enjoying themselves.

It remains to sum up briefly the most important events of the past month. It commenced auspiciously with the performance of Mr. F. Cowen's Symphony in C minor, generally called the "Norwegian," which was played with a refinement and accuracy indicative of the care bestowed by Mr. Manns upon the preparation of this important English work. Of the merits of Mr. Cowen's Symphony we have previously spoken. After a second hearing there remains little doubt that it is the most ambitious and most successful effort in symphonic writing made by any English composer for many years past. Even the warmest admirers of Mr. Cowen's music could not have expected from his pen a work so full of serious and elevated purpose, and at the same time so attractive and so fluently melodious. Another remarkable feature of the same concert was the first appearance at the Crystal Palace of Miss Edith Santley, whose well-trained, though not very powerful, voice and refined style of declamation won her the sympathy of the audience. Herr Joachim played the Adagio and Allegro from Spohr's sixth Concerto, and his own variations for violin and orchestra on the same occasion (the 2nd ult.).

The second Concert of the month opened with Mr. Walter Macfarren's Overture, "Hero and Leander," and closed with Berlioz' "Carnaval Romain," the Symphony being Schumann's No. 2, in C. The appearance of M. Tivadar Nagrath at the same Concert did not produce any great impression. M. Nachéz is of Hungarian origin and training, as is sufficiently proved by the rhythmical piquancy of his style, which, however, does not enable him to appear to advantage in Mendelssohn's Concerto, seeing especially the memories of the great masters of the violin with which that work is identified. The new player was more in his element in some Hungarian dances of his own devising.

A violinist of a very different stamp appeared at the Concert of the 16th ult. Herr Waldemar Mayer is a pupil of Joachim, and his style betrays the solidity and seriousness of the German school. He is a clever, but not as yet a finished player, his intonation being anything but perfect. This fault may be accounted for partly by the instrument; partly by the differences of pitch, and partly, perhaps, by the composition which Herr Mayer had chosen for his début. His courage in selecting a new work for his first appearance cannot be sufficiently commended; unfortunately his judgment was not equally good. The Violin Concerto by M. P. Rüfer cannot by any stretch of courtesy be called an interesting composition. It is an imitation, and not a very clever one, of Mendelssohn and Schumann's style; and in addition to this want of originality, it is written without due regard for the requirements of the solo instrument. The passages for the latter seem extremely difficult and awkward, without showing commensurate brilliancy in return; hence, no doubt, the uncertainty of intonation above referred to, which was less observable in the minor pieces contributed by Mr. Mayer. The principal item of the same concert was a work deserving more detailed notice than we can at present bestow on it; it was Liszt's symphonic poem the "Ideals" (not the "Ideal," as the programme inaccurately stated), placed where it should not have been, at the beginning of the performance. Liszt has taken for his subject Schiller's "Die Ideale," a philosophic poem of great depth and beauty of language, but without those dramatic and graphic elements which immediately lend themselves to musical treatment. Liszt, indeed, has thought it necessary to modify the sequence of the stanzas and to add an "apotheosis," in order to gain the requisite climax for his finale. That a work of this kind should not produce the immediate impression of the same composer's "Mazeppa" or "Dante" is not a matter for surprise. The music, in accordance with its poetic basis, is of a contemplative rather than of a passionate character, and certain passages in recitative form derive their significance evidently from their immediate connection with the poem. An English audience unacquainted with that poem is therefore placed at a considerable disadvantage; and much enlightenment was scarcely afforded by extracts from Lord Lytton's translation, and the somewhat fulsome commentary for which Mr. F. Niecks was responsible. There were some beautiful snatches of melody, and the instrumentation betrayed the master's hand; but, apart from this, the public might well be excused for modestly deferring their final verdict till after a second hearing—and so may the critic.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

WITH the three Concerts now under notice, the twenty-third series, which will compare favourably with its predecessors, has come to a close, not, we may add, without leaving a gap in the weekly existence of numerous amateurs, by whom the promised resumption of these Concerts early in November next will be looked forward to with eager anticipation. No one observing, like ourselves, from year to year the progress made by this institution in educating the popular taste for abstract music of the highest order, can fail to have been struck with the steadily increasing attention and intelligent appreciation manifested on the part of an audience composed of various grades of society. This is in itself an achievement upon which the directors may well be congratulated, and of the consequently increasing responsibilities of which they are doubtless aware.

The Concert of March 28 opened with a capital performance, on the part of MM. Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti, of Beethoven's String Quartet in F minor (Op. 95, No. 11), dedicated by the composer to his friend Zmeskall de Domanovetz, and one of the finest of its class, certainly one of the most truly reflective of the composer's grand individuality. Madame Schumann again contributed to the evening's enjoyment by playing in her best manner the Nocturne in B major (Op. 62) and the Scherzo in B minor (Op. 20), both well known to every amateur, her interpretation eliciting the usual enthusiastic applause, and the substitution of an additional piece in response to an encore. In the second part of the programme Herr Joachim, in conjunction with Mr. Eugene D'Albert, delighted his hearers by playing a Romance in B flat (Op. 2) of his own composition, as well as three of the Hungarian Dances composed by Brahms for two pianofortes, and arranged for his instrument and the pianoforte by the eminent violinist in question. Mr. D'Albert, the young pianist of whose exceptional talents we have already spoken on previous occasions, also joined MM. Joachim and Piatti in a con amore rendering of Mozart's Pianoforte Trio in E major, and may justly claim for himself a fair share of the applause with which each movement of the beautiful work was greeted. The Trio under notice is one of the many masterpieces with which its prolific composer has enriched the world of art, and, as regards symmetry and transparency of design and harmonious development, has scarcely been surpassed even by Mozart himself. It should be produced at least once during every season, if only to serve as a standard measure for the species of artwork to which it belongs. The vocalist was Madame Lavrovskaya, who made her début on this occasion, and was extremely well received. The lady possesses a fine contralto voice of considerable range, and appears to excel in dramatic song, as was apparent by her rendering of the air "Divinités du Styx" from Gluck's "Alceste," which she finely declaimed, while in her subsequent delivery of Schubert's "Erl King" she was less successful. An admirable translation of Goethe's famous poem, by Campbell Clarke, was appended to the last-mentioned song in the programme-book, and may be recommended for the use of all amateurs preferring an English version.

At the last Concert but one (the 4th ult.), Miss Agnes Zimmermann was the pianist, her solo performance consisting of two pieces by Mendelssohn, viz., the Fantasia in E major, entitled "The Rivulet" (Op. 16), and a Prelude and Fugue in E minor; both comparatively early productions of the composer, but exhibiting all the refinement of thought and finished workmanship which characterise his later compositions. The Fantasia is one of three pieces written during the composer's visit to Scotland in 1829; and the Prelude and Fugue (according to Julius Rietz's somewhat superficial catalogue) dates from the year 1827, when the composer was about eighteen. We have often had to speak in terms of high praise of Miss Zimmermann's qualifications as a pianist, and it is, therefore, unnecessary on this occasion to say more than that her interpretation of the pieces in question, and participation, earlier in the evening, in Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25), were fully worthy of the reputation she has so justly gained, both in this country and on the Continent. In the execution of the Quartet (for the eighth time here) the lady was joined by MM. Joachim, Straus, and Piatti, and it therefore follows as a matter of course that full justice was done to the composer, whose music invariably meets with a favourable reception at these Concerts. A leading feature in the programme was Herr Joachim's magnificent rendering of Bach's Chaconne in D minor, which we have so frequently heard him play, and the execution of which has appeared to us each time one of the grandest achievements, both technically and intellectually, of that artist. The eminent violinist also led an admirable performance of Mendelssohn's Ottet in E flat (Op. 20), in association with MM. Ries, Pollitzer, Wiener, Straus, Zerbini, Pezze, and Piatti, with which the Concert concluded. Madame Lavrovskaya was again the vocalist, and followed up the favourable impression produced by her fine voice and excellent training on the previous Monday, in an air from Handel's "Semele," and songs by Gounod and Chopin respectively.

The final Concert of the season (the 11th ult.) presented, as customary here, a programme of exceptional length and variety, if not of novelty. Beethoven's String Quartet in E flat (Op. 74), Veracini's Largo and Allegro for Violoncello, Schumann's "Carnaval," Spohr's Duo Concertante in A minor (Op. 67, No. 1) for Violins, Bach's Gigue in B flat, and Scarlatti's Presto in D, for Pianoforte, four of Brahms's Hungarian Dances for Violin and Pianoforte, and vocal pieces by Mozart and Schubert—such were the elements constituting a programme which might well have provided sufficient musical food for two evenings. In the presence of such an embarras de richesses it is difficult to single out special features of interest. Suffice it to say that the executive artists were Madame Schumann (who played the "Carnaval"), Miss Agnes Zimmermann (who contributed the Gigue and Presto), Mdlle. Louise Pyk (the vocalist of the evening), and MM. Joachim, Straus, Ries, and Piatti; the two first-named gentlemen joining in Spohr's Duo, and Signor Piatti playing the violoncello solo. Where such artists combine to give their best on the director's benefit night, criticism becomes disarmed, and a mere record of the performance all that is required. M. Zerbini was throughout the season a most efficient accompanist at these Concerts, which, as already stated, will be resumed in the early part of November next. We cannot conclude this notice without expressing a hope that the list of artists who will appear during the coming season may again include the name of Madame Schumann, to the satisfaction of her numerous devotees in this country.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

A SECOND hearing of Berlioz' Dramatic Symphony "Roméo et Juliette," at the Concert on the 7th ult., tended rather to deepen the impressions which we recorded in our last number, the excessive merits of portions of the work seeming to bring even into greater prominence its many defects, upon a closer acquaintance with the score. The "Love Scene" is indeed a charming specimen of "programme music," but the orchestral colouring in other movements—much of which was doubtless novel enough to excite the ire of the "purists," in the days of Berlioz—like a glowing picture on canvas, often lulls the senses into a forgetfulness of the want of any definite design. The declamatory phrases given to Friar Laurence in the finale we still think a blot upon the composition; although in the "Oath of Reconciliation," with which the chorus is combined, there is some really excellent writing, both for voices and instruments. On the whole the performance of the work was scarcely so good as on the occasion of its production, and its reception hardly so enthusiastic; but we are nevertheless justified in believing that it will occasionally find a place in the répertoire of a Society which now seems sufficiently awaking from its lethargy to follow, if not to lead, the taste of the day. The contralto solo part was well sung by Miss Hope Glenn; but Signor Ghilberti scarcely satisfied us as much in the music assigned to Friar Laurence as Mr. F. King, to whom it was intrusted on the first performance of the work. In the second part Madame Montigny-Rémaury gave so artistic and intellectual a rendering of Beethoven's pianoforte Concerto in C (No. 1) as to draw forth the most enthusiastic marks of approbation from all who love pure and legitimate playing; indeed, we may say that rarely has this beautiful work produced a more marked effect. Another feature in the evening was the singing of Mr. Sims Reeves in Beethoven's "Liederkreis" (Circle of songs), all of which he gave with a truth of expression and a refinement of style that might be taken to heart by the students of the day as a lesson of the highest order. The charmingly sympathetic pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Coenen must also be mentioned in words of warm praise. Mr. Reeves likewise contributed Schubert's song "Weary flowers their buds are closing," and Mendelssohn's "Hunter's Song" (also accompanied by Mr. Coenen), in his very best manner, eliciting for each composition the most genuine applause. The Concert commenced with the Overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro" and closed with the Overture to "Tannhäuser," the latter, especially, being exceedingly well played. Mr. W. G. Cusins conducted.

THE BACH CHOIR.

THIS Choir is nothing if not eclectic. It comprehends all excellence, from the music of the great man whose name it bears to that written yesterday, and it is by no means careful to study particular and exclusive tastes when drawing up programmes. The managers act upon the full belief, apparently, that whatever is good should be admired; hence, at the second Concert of the present season, given in St. James's Hall on the 6th ult., they presented two works exceedingly diverse in character. It did not seem very probable that an audience attracted by Brahms's "German Requiem" would care much for Handel's "Alexander's Feast," or vice versa; but the Bach Society assumes a public as eclectic as itself, and, we are glad to say, is in a position to take its own course and act up to its own principles. Handel's work did not appear to excite a very lively interest, nor, indeed, does "Alexander's Feast" possess, in itself, a great amount of vitality. A few numbers, such as "Revenge, Timotheus cries," and the chorus "At last divine Cecilia came," keep the piece in remembrance, but a good many others are, it is to be feared, relegated to the museum of musical antiquarianism. From this, however, it by no means follows that the Cantata should suffer neglect. Rather would we infer that it should be looked after from time to time, and kept alive for the sake not alone of Handel, but of much in it that has both interest and value for musical students. The performance, conducted by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, could hardly have been more complete. With such artists as Mrs. Osgood, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, the important solos were perfectly safe; while the choral and orchestral music was given in a manner that showed how apt were the performers and how adequate their preparation for the task. Mr. Lloyd exerted himself unsparingly, like the conscientious man he is, though his work was far from grateful; and Mr. Santley obtained a familiar success in the well-known dramatic air already named.

Turning to Brahms's "Requiem," the Society got upon more familiar ground. It was the first to give London amateurs a fair opportunity of hearing this work, and very little rehearsal could have been needed to secure even so fine a performance as that of which we now speak. The difficulties of the "Requiem" have been pointed out over and over again, together with the fact that, from their very nature, they must always remain difficulties, even in the experience of those who do no more than listen. But the music—so noble and dignified, so profound in its sentiment and so elevating—steadily makes way amongst us, and, we believe, will win a permanent place. Should this happen, the Bach Society may claim the credit of doing most to bring it about. We shall not rediscuss the work, but simply bear our testimony to the manner in which Mrs. Osgood sang the touching soprano solos, and in which the concerted pieces were rendered. Nothing more impressive could be desired than the effect of some of the choruses. The audience felt their power, and, if only partially able to appreciate the composer's working, rendered instinctive homage to his genius. The Society gives one more Concert this season, at which Bach's grand Mass will be repeated.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THE Concert given by the students of this Institution at St. James's Hall on the 9th ult. was interesting, not only to the supporters and friends of the Academy, but to all music-lovers; for the programme contained the first part of Handel's rarely heard "Semele," a work described on its production at Covent Garden Theatre in 1744 as "after the manner of an Oratorio." A specimen of what may be termed the "secular Oratorio" of the day, it may certainly take rank with similar compositions of Handel which have obtained a greater popularity; for although unquestionably displaying the mannerisms of the composer, it abounds in beauties, and, especially in the choral portions, establishes its right to be termed, as it appears in Dr. Arnold's edition, a "Dramatic performance." The very trying solos allotted to Semele were sung by Miss Thudichum (the present holder of the Parepa-Rosa Scholarship), who evidenced the possession of a pure soprano voice in a promising course of cultivation; Miss Marian McKenzie in the music of Athamas was highly effective, especially in the air "Hymen, haste! thy torch prepare!" and Miss Lewis was deserving of all the applause she received for her intelligent rendering of the part of Ino, more particularly in her portion of the fine duet with Athamas, "You've undone me." The characters of Cadmus and the High Priest were sustained by Mr. Bernard Southcote and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint respectively, the latter displaying a good voice, and singing with much care and earnestness. The choir showed the result of excellent training; and the orchestra was efficient throughout. In the miscellaneous selection which followed, the good pianoforte-teaching in the Academy was satisfactorily proved by the playing of Miss Lucy Ellam in the Rondo from Hummel's Concerto in B minor, Miss Elizabeth Foskett in the Barcarole and Presto from Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in F minor, and Miss Alice Borton in an "Andante and Rondo" of her own composition, the latter movement of which, especially, is extremely meritorious. The solo vocalists, Miss Mary Beare, Miss Florence Norman, Miss M. Spencer Jones, Miss Effie Clements, and Mr. B. Davies, more or less distinguished themselves in the pieces selected for them; and Mr. Whitehouse in the "Andante Lento" from Piatelli's Violoncello Concerto in D minor, and Master Thomas Barker in the "Andantino" and "Allegro Moderato" from John Thomas's Harp Concerto in B flat, were warmly and most deservedly applauded. Two compositions by the students were given, an effective and cleverly scored Overture, "Amgiad and Assad" ("Arabian Nights"), by Percy Stranders, and a "Credo" by Maude V. White (Mendelssohn Scholar). The writing in this last-named piece is something beyond ordinary student-work; and, indeed, portions of the opening and closing chorus would do credit to a thoroughly experienced artist. The Quartet, "Qui propter," is a most sympathetic setting of the words, and created a marked effect upon the audience. The principal parts were well sung by Mrs. Irene Ware, Miss Annie Grey, Mr. Robertson, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Much of the success of the Concert was undoubtedly owing to the earnest and intelligent conducting of Mr. William Shakespeare, who is evidently exerting himself to the utmost to do honour to the responsible post which he occupies.

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE first Concert of this Amateur Association for the present season was given at St. James's Hall on the 2nd ult., before a highly appreciative audience. The "Dixit Dominus" of Leonardo Leo, which commenced the programme, is the same work that was performed at the last Gloucester Festival, and upon the many excellent points of which we commented at the time. On the present occasion, the clear contrapuntal writing which distinguishes the compositions of the old Neapolitan master was brought out with remarkable distinctness; the fugue "Tu es sacerdos," especially, being thoroughly satisfactory, both in the accuracy of the notes and the decision with which the points were attacked. The solo vocalists, Misses Anna Williams, Wakefield, and Jessie Jones, Mr. Charles Wade, and the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton, were admirable; Miss Williams giving the whole of her music with true artistic feeling, and being extremely well supported both by her professional and amateur allies. Goetz's setting of the 137th Psalm, "By the Waters of Babylon," is fast attaining the popularity it deserves; and its rendering by the carefully trained choir of this Society, and the now well-known amateur vocalists the Viscountess Folkestone and the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton was everything that could be desired: indeed we may say that not only for voice, cultivated tone, and executive facility, but for unexaggerated expression and earnest sympathy with the text, the singing of the Viscountess Folkestone fully entitled her to that applause which is too often offered at amateur concerts as a tribute rather to position than to talent. The performance of Max Bruch's Violin Concerto by Herr Emil Mahr elevated the music into a prominence above its intrinsic merits, the Adagio, especially, being given with a refinement of feeling which created a marked effect with the audience. We shall be glad again to hear this artist in a work requiring higher qualities than are demanded by Herr Bruch's Concerto. Mr. E. Silas's Magnificat, with which the Concert concluded, although not written in what may be termed the very "severe" style, displays contrapuntal power of a high order, more especially perhaps observable in the choral piece "Fecit potentiam" than in the more ambitious fugue which terminates the work. The opening movement, too, has some remarkably fine points, the orchestration giving much brightness to the voice parts, which are always expressive of the text. The quartet "Et misericordia" is melodious and effective, the bass and tenor solos being perhaps the least attractive portions of the work. The principal vocalists, Lady Folkestone, Miss Wakefield, Mr. C. Wade, and the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton, exerted themselves to the utmost to give due effect to the composition, and the choir was thoroughly efficient throughout. The Concert was conducted by Mr. Barnby with that skill and judgment which have already produced such excellent results in this newly formed Society.

OPERA COMIQUE.

THE triumphant reception of an Opera by Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan is now a matter so thoroughly assured as to place all concerned in its production perfectly at their ease. Whether this fact may act detrimentally upon author, composer, and singers is, however, worthy of consideration by all who look beyond the success of the hour; and, as we unhesitatingly rank ourselves in this minority, something more than a mere record of the event seems imperatively called for. Mr. Gilbert as an author, and Mr. Sullivan as a composer, were eminent before they combined their talents to produce comic operas. Great things, indeed, might reasonably be expected from such a partnership; and if so firm a hold of the public as to cause almost a craving for more works from their pen were the one thing for which they worked, the result may be pronounced in the highest degree encouraging. But the question whether either artist has advanced his reputation in his special department remains to be answered; and to do this we must dispassionately decide whether literature has been enriched by the amusing libretti of "The Sorcerer," "H. M. S. Pinafore," "The Pirates of Penzance," and "Patience," or music by the clever settings of the text. Placing aside, then, all notions of popularity, we cannot but consider that the art-work of both author and composer has been lowered, instead of raised, since the establishment of that union which, commercially speaking, has proved so lucrative. Prosaic critics, whose duty it is to judge of works by their probable effect upon the future, instead of their positive effect upon the present, have assuredly a thankless task before them when compelled to qualify that praise which they might simply echo; but having stated our reasons for such qualification, we feel, at least, that we can now speak freely without fear of being misunderstood. The new Opera, "Patience, or Bunthorne's Bride," produced on the 23rd ult., is neither better nor worse than those which have preceded it. In Mr. Gilbert's share of the work we have wit, exceptional cleverness in rhyming, and extravagant humour in sufficient abundance to draw forth both applause and laughter such as is rarely heard in a theatre; the only question is whether, as a satire upon the "æsthetic" craze of the day, it does not miss its mark from the breadth of its caricature. To give some examples, the dress of Lady Jane is not only repulsive in its ugliness, but so absurd as to appear rather a clumsy joke than an exaggerated specimen of æsthetic costume. The verses recited both by the "fleshy" poet, Bunthorne, and the "idyllic" poet, Archibald Grosvenor, have not that delicacy of satire, the quiet power of which never fails in its intended effect; for in one we are told that the pangs of love can be "set right with calomel," and the other merely contains some nonsense lines such as—

Gentle Jane was as good as gold,
She always did as she was told.

and in a second effusion—

Teasing Tom was a very bad boy:
A great big squirt was his favourite toy.

We may also say that the idea of Bunthorne putting himself up to be raffled for by the ladies lies too much beyond the bounds of probability to be funny—a fact fully proved by the absence of laughter when the proposition was made. It will be unnecessary to describe the plot in detail. Let it suffice to say that Bunthorne, surrounded by the "rapturous maidens," preserves his character as an æsthetic poet; but that left to himself, he announces that he is a sham, and makes love to Patience, a dairymaid, who, however, declares that she knows nothing of the passion. Archibald Grosvenor arriving on the scene, she, nevertheless, falls in love with him; but as he declares himself to be perfection, and Patience has been told that love must be unselfish, she declines to marry him because there would be no self-sacrifice in such an act. In spite of a body of Dragoon Guards, who are engaged to the æsthetic ladies, Bunthorne is so persecuted that he puts himself up to be raffled for; but Patience declaring her love for him because he is ugly, the damsels transfer their affection to Archibald Grosvenor. In the second act the Colonel, Major, and Lieutenant of the Dragoon Guards have doffed their uniform and assumed the character of æsthetes, by which device they win the affections of two of the "damozels." The "massive" Lady Jane, however, remains faithful to Bunthorne; but Grosvenor eventually consents to become a Philistine, and the rest of the characters following his example, they assume the dress and manners of ordinary mortals, Patience resolving to become Grosvenor's bride now that he is not too beautiful, and Lady Jane wedding Lieutenant the Duke of Dunstable (who chooses her because she is "distinctly plain"), leaving Bunthorne a bachelor. This hasty sketch of the principal incidents of the Opera will sufficiently prove that the materials with which Mr. Gilbert has worked are capable of being turned to good account; but for any notion of the manner in which they are treated our readers must be referred to the libretto itself. The excessive pungency of the dialogue forms only a portion of the attraction of the work, for the characters are admirably drawn throughout, and, although only belonging to the world of burlesque, are always thoroughly amusing. How Mr. Sullivan has acquitted himself of the musical portion of the work it is almost unnecessary to inform those acquainted with his former Operas, of the artistic value of which we have recorded our opinion at the commencement of the present notice. Ruled thoroughly by the wit and humour of his partner, he sets himself the task of so faithfully colouring the text, as to make words and music inseparable; occasionally, however, showing an artistic power, even in the most comic situations, which materially intensifies the good-natured satire of the author. Instances of this occur in the opening music for the Dragoons, and also in the recitative and air for Lady Jane—in the first portion of which she accompanies herself on the violoncello—the treatment of which, both for voices and instruments, is masterly. The effective pieces are too numerous to mention; but we must especially cite the first duet between Patience and Grosvenor (the refrain of which is charming), Patience's song, "I cannot tell what this love may be"; the duet, "Long years ago," for Patience and Angela; the unaccompanied sestet, "I hear the soft note"; and a quintet in the second act, as amongst the happiest specimens of the composer's talent for pure melody and appropriate orchestration. In every respect the performance was excellent. Miss Leonora Braham gave a perfect realisation of the Milkmaid, Patience, her pure and sympathetic vocalisation, and her clever acting throughout, winning the good opinion of all; the Lady Jane of Miss Alice Barnett must also be highly commended; and Misses Jessie Bond, J. Gwynne, and Portescue were thoroughly efficient as the principal æsthetic ladies. Mr. Barrington played, with a keen sense of the humour of his part, the "perfect" poet Grosvenor, and sang the whole of his music so well as to elicit loud and well-deserved applause; Mr. G. Grossmith being equally effective as the rival poet, Bunthorne; Mr. Richard Temple, as the Colonel, Mr. F. Thornton, as the Major, and Mr. D. Lely, as the Lieutenant-Duke, were highly satisfactory; and the chorus showed very evident signs of good and careful training. The encores were almost too frequent to be recorded, and at the conclusion of the opera Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan were called on the stage and cordially greeted by a thoroughly gratified audience.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

At the Gentlemen's Concert, on March 28, Sullivan's incidental music to the "Merchant of Venice," Scherzo from first Symphony (W. H. Thorley), and Schumann's Overture to "Genève" were the principal orchestral pieces. The first-named work is not in the composer's happiest style; though clever in construction and instrumentation, it lacks originality, and most of the themes are unworthy of the technical ability displayed in their treatment. The Scherzo by Mr. W. H. Thorley, which is at present in manuscript, is the composition of a gentleman whose family has long been connected with and distinguished in musical art in this city. The work displays constructive ability of a high order of merit; the initial phrase, which does not owe its distinctive character to its syncopated treatment, is not less charming than original, and we shall anticipate with pleasure the production of the Symphony of which this Scherzo forms part. Miss Dora Schirmacher gave an admirable reading of Mendelssohn's G minor pianoforte Concerto (the only point for criticism being the excessive speed at which she took the first part of the opening movement), and played with great success solos by Rameau and Chopin. Miss Schirmacher is perhaps slightly deficient in power, but her mastery of technique, and sympathy with the composers whose works she interprets, more than condoned the minor shortcoming alluded to. Miss Orridge was very successful in Handel's "Che vive Amante," but only partially so in Rossi's lugubrious "Gelosia." Mr. Maas gave in his best style Verdi's "Quande le sere al placido" and Caracciolo's "Stars of the summer night." Mr. Hecht conducted with great care and ability.—The Athenæum Musical Society completed its fourteenth season on the 5th ult., when the programme included two choral numbers from Hofmann's "Melusina," "The Dream," a Serenata by Sir M. Costa, and Dr. Hiles's Cantata "The Crusaders." The last-named fine but difficult work contains much admirable choral writing, and the dramatic nature of the libretto is excellently reproduced. The performance of this and the other works of which the programme consisted was only open to the criticism that the nuances were not sufficiently observed.—On Good Friday afternoon a selection from Handel's Passion Music was performed in the Cathedral. The choruses were exceedingly well rendered by the Cathedral Choir, which was slightly augmented for the occasion, and the solos, if somewhat less satisfactory, were, on the whole, well given. Mr. J. K. Pyne, the Cathedral Organist, presided at the organ.

THE Guildhall Orchestral Society gave two Concerts during the course of last month, the first taking place at the Mansion House on Saturday, the 2nd ult., and the other at the Guildhall on Saturday, the 23rd ult. On both occasions large audiences, by frequent and hearty applause, testified the high appreciation in which the Society is held. There can be no doubt but that great good must result from the support the City Fathers have lately given to music. The presence of the Lord Mayor and other dignitaries of the Corporation showed that they are not content with merely voting money and forming committees, but are anxious to demonstrate, by public attendance at the concerts, the lively interest taken in the educational movements lately sprung up within the ancient boundaries. The proceedings at the first Concert proved a most pleasant surprise, especially to those who, having experience with amateur orchestras, know what to expect when works like Mendelssohn's Overture "A Calm Sea and a Prosperous Voyage," the Allegro moderato movement from Schubert's Symphony in B minor, and the March from Berlioz' "Faust" are set down for performance. But with the Guildhall Society there were comparatively few traces of the crudeness usually marking the efforts of amateurs. The violins, first and second, were remarkably good, the cellos and basses fair, and the "wood" and "brass" proved trustworthy. Indeed, the playing of the band, under the careful and intelligent direction of Mr. Weist Hill, was generally admirable, although there were many points somewhat rough, which, with further practice, will doubtless disappear. Besides the more serious works enumerated above, the band performed compositions by Svendsen, Déléibes, Louis Diehl, and Michaelis. Although the lighter contributions certainly found greater favour with the audience, yet this fact should not lead Mr. Hill to include too many of that class in the programmes. The vocalists, mostly pupils of the Guildhall School of Music, were fairly acceptable, but in some cases scarcely advanced enough for a public performance. Miss Bessie Cox showed neat execution, if not an entirely pleasant voice, in "O bid your faithful Ariel fly," and Miss Evelyn Gibson sang Bennett's "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out" in a manner that secured her applause which should encourage her to persevere in the study of the art of singing. Messrs. Henderson and Gluenstein also proved themselves to be possessors of a certain amount of vocal skill, and Mr. V. Gerard deserves a word of recognition for his excellent clarinet solo. At the second Concert the programme was materially improved by several choral numbers, rendered by a choir of some 120 voices. The eight-part chorus "Judge me, O God" (Mendelssohn), a fair test of merit, was given with admirable exactitude, the balance of parts being well kept, the attack made with decision, and the gradations of tone observed with scrupulous care. The chief orchestral pieces in this Concert were the Overture to "William Tell," the first movement of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, and an Overture Humouristique by Mr. Weist Hill, entitled "Gog and Magog." The latter composition, supposed to describe a little adventure which happened to the civic giants, is of doubtful merit, and it may be questioned whether any good can accrue from this class of music. Regarding the performance of the entire instrumental selection little can be said in censure, for it would be hypercritical to expect amateurs to play without slip or flaw. The vocalists were, for the greater part, more experienced than those who appeared at the previous Concert. Indeed, Mdle. Giulia Welmi, in Donizetti's "O luce di quest' anima," sang with considerable finesse; and unless it had been so stated in the programme it would have been doubted whether this lady could still be a pupil of any institution. Mention should be made of Mr. C. Chilley, who displayed a capital tenor voice to considerable advantage in "If with all your hearts," from "Elijah." Messrs. J. Harrison and David Beardwell were accompanists, and Mr. Weist Hill was an ever-ready and watchful Conductor.

As a proof that in Ireland, if not in England, it is possible for an artist to gain a hearing for an original lyrical work, we extract with pleasure, from a local paper, a condensed account of the recent production at the Cork Theatre of an Opera called "Amergen," the composition of a young Irishman named M'Swiney. After speaking of the talent displayed in the libretto of the Opera the notice continues thus:—

The music, which is of a most pleasing character throughout, is as a whole, extraordinarily well written. In considering the work of so young a student as Mr. M'Swiney one does not expect to meet with a finished combination of themes, so as to make a whole perfect in form; this only must be looked for in the work of the experienced composer who has long passed his scientific education. But though the orchestration of "Amergen" has some faults (it would be a marvel if it had not) the many beauties which abound in this extraordinary composition more than compensate for them, and the music is of a character that leaves us no option but to believe it is the work of one who is gifted with real genius, which will one day assert itself more strikingly. The prologue of the opera opens with a fine chorus of students, shortly after which is sung the love song of Amergen, the words of which are as pretty as the music, which Mr. Sylvanni (Amergen) rendered with ability. The following scene contains one of the best songs of the opera, "From Norland's cold and wintry shore," which Mr. I. D. Fitzgerald, the Soldier of Fortune, sang in splendid style. At the close of the prologue, the High King and his fair daughter Adela enter, and Amergen in presence of the people, drinks from the drugged goblet and falls insensible. The first act, in the garden of the court of the High King, opens with a very beautiful ballad for Adela; the words, which are by Gerald Griffin, being wedded to a lovely air. In this Bessie Craig, who was most warmly received, was heard with great pleasure. In the fourth scene, a love passage between Amergen and Adela, there was fine scope for the display of vocal ability, with which Miss Craig delighted the audience. The second act opens with the return of Amergen, and here is a good tenor ballad, "There was a morn of my weary life," which Mr. Sylvanni delivered with excellent effect. The second scene, representing the return of the High King, and all the succeeding scenes are admirably well conceived, and their performance admirable. The High King (Mr. McCormack) describes the battle in stirring tones, but Adela mourns for Amergen. At the declaration of the people "He hath sworn" comes in again the delightfully graceful theme which is the air of the opera. The song of Adela, "Yes; alone will I seek," is scarcely finished when the song of Amergen, "Ah, wilt thou deny me" is heard without, and the lovers having been reunited, the opera terminates with another splendid chorus. At the end of the second act there was a loud call for the composer, and when, in answer to the call, Mr. Paul M'Swiney made his appearance to bow his acknowledgments, he received an ovation which he will long remember. The greatest enthusiasm was manifested, hats and handkerchiefs being waved in pleasant excitement. Again, at the conclusion, the audience before separating, gave Mr. M'Swiney another ovation.

WE expressed regret, at this time last year, that the Festival in aid of the Royal School for Daughters of Officers in the Army, which had for the last two years been held at St. Paul's Cathedral with really grand musical effect, consequent upon the employment therein of four military bands, could not be repeated at that season; and we expressed a hope that some other opportunity might be afforded to the bands of combining to take part in the performance of Divine Service in the same place. We are glad now to be able to chronicle the fulfilment, in a measure, of this hope, as the same Society purposes holding, in Westminster Abbey, on Thursday afternoon, the 12th inst., a Festival similar to those previously held in St. Paul's; and although, from its smaller size and general arrangement, the Abbey is scarcely so suitable a building as the Cathedral for a service of the sort, the effect, nevertheless, can hardly fail to be exceedingly striking. An organ will be erected specially for the occasion by Messrs. Hill and Son, at which Mr. George C. Martin will preside, the Choir being seated in the Sacristy, and the military bands massed under the lantern. The music will be the same as that used at the two former Festivals, namely, G. C. Martin's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in B flat, and the last four movements of Sullivan's Festival Te Deum, with the addition—a notable one—of Sullivan's arrangement of St. Ann's tune to the hymn "The Son of God goes forth to war," scored for full military band (with the composer's permission) by Mr. Dan Godfrey.

THE first of three Concerts announced by Madame Sainton-Dolby took place on Thursday afternoon, the 7th ult., at the Steinway Hall, before a numerous and kindly-disposed audience. Not that any very great stretch of leniency was needed, for the pupils introduced by the gifted lady were mostly worthy of the applause granted them by the interested auditors. The performers were all pupils, past and present, of the Vocal Academy over which Madame Sainton presides, and many of the rising singers showed evidence of instruction which could only be imparted by one possessing a perfect knowledge of the vocal art. Indeed, few teachers in this or any country have had more experience in the best schools of vocalisation than the educator of the young ladies who made their début on the occasion under notice; and if they fail to profit by invaluable counsels, the fault will either be in want of ability or attention. The singers who during the afternoon most distinguished themselves were: Miss Winthrop, heard to advantage in Hummel's "L'imbroso notte vien"; Miss Arthur, who delivered the trying air from the "Creation," "On mighty pens," in good style; and Madame Mary Cummings, who demonstrated by a careful performance of Rossi's "Ah! Rendemi quel core" the value of teaching acquired in former years at the Academy. Miss Fusselle also made a favourable impression in Costa's "I will extol Thee." Schumann's "Requiem for Mignon" was rendered in an admirable manner, under the careful guidance of M. Sainton, the solos being taken by Mdles. Fusselle, Blackwell, Winthrop, Wallis, and Mr. Edwin Perry. Mr. Arnold (a pupil of M. Sainton) varied the proceedings by playing very cleverly two violin solos. Mr. Leipold was an able accompanist.

THE prospectus of Her Majesty's Opera, for the present season, promises but one novelty, and that an opera by an amateur, the Hungarian composer, Baron Bodog Orczy. In the Italian version, by Signor Marchesi, it is entitled "Il Rinnegato," and the principal character will be sustained by Madame Etelka Gerster. "Semiramide," with Madame Christine Nilsson as the Assyrian Queen, is mentioned as a probable attraction; but we question whether the taste for Rossini's florid music has not died out with the artists who brought it into such prominence. Madame Nilsson has now so thoroughly identified herself with Margherita and Helen of Troy, in Boito's "Mefistofele," that the revival of this opera will, no doubt, be most anxiously looked for; and in the extensive répertoire, printed in Mr. Mapleson's prospectus, we cannot but think that many other characters will be found more sympathetic with this eminent vocalist's acquirements than that which has been chosen as a novelty. In addition to the artists already named, the engagements include Mdles. Lehman, Vanzandt, Dotti, Valerga, Ricci, Anna de Bellocca, and Tremelli, and Madame Trebelli, since announced to appear at the Royal Italian Opera (sopranos and contraltos); Signori Campanini, Fancelli, Runcio, Ravelli, and Mr. Maas (tenors); Signori Galassi, Del Puente, Rota, Nannetti, and Monti (baritones and basses); with Signori Corsini and Novara, who appear for the first time in this country. Signor Arditi, with the assistance of Signor Faccio, is named as the conductor. "The services of the band and chorus," it is said, "have been retained as hitherto." The season is announced to commence on the 7th inst.

THE third of the Trio Concerts given by Herren Max Laistner and Emil Mahr took place on the 21st ult. at St. George's Hall. Two trios were performed, one by Goldmark, in B flat, being, we believe, a genuine novelty. The first movement is clear and vigorous, and made a favourable impression, which was maintained by the next section, an elegiac and expressive slow movement in the tonic minor. After this the interest falls off. The scherzo is vague, and the finale rather discursive and laboured. As a whole, therefore, the work cannot be pronounced a masterpiece, and the composer of the "Rustic Wedding" Symphony has yet to prove his title to a place in the first rank of contemporary musicians. Brahms's Trio in E flat, for pianoforte, violin, and horn (Op. 40), has been heard once or twice in London. It is by no means equal to the pianoforte quartet or quintet of the same composer, but it contains many fine passages, and is worthy of occasional performance. In the miscellaneous portion of the programme were Raff's Chaconne in A minor, for two pianofortes, a brilliant and showy piece; some piano solos by Herr Laistner, whose technique is excellent; and a brief Adagio for violoncello by Bargiel, played with much taste by Herr Völlmar. Mdlle. Kottlitz, a mezzo-soprano vocalist, somewhat unwisely selected Beethoven's scena, "Ah! perfido," which she had to transpose to the key of C, greatly to its disadvantage. The last Concert of the series will take place on Thursday, the 26th inst.

THE announcement of "Mr. Sims Reeves's Farewell in Oratorio" although calling attention to one of the most interesting events of the musical season, cannot but cause a feeling of regret at the thought that we are parting with one of the most valued artists the world has seen. In connection with the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Barnby, Mr. Reeves intends giving eight Oratorio performances in the Albert Hall, at which the following artists, in addition to the bénéficiaire, will appear: Mesdames Christine Nilsson, Albani, Trebelli, and Patey; Mr. E. Lloyd, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley; negotiations also being pending with Madame Adelina Patti and other vocalists, whose names will be duly announced. There will be an orchestra and chorus of 1,000 performers, Dr. Stainer presiding at the organ. The works selected for performance are Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Haydn's "Creation," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Handel's "Israel in Egypt," "Samson," and "Messiah." The first Concert was announced for the 27th ult.—too late for notice in our present number—when "Judas Maccabæus," was to be given. All the performances except one will take place on Wednesday evenings; and, by special desire, a morning performance will be given on Saturday, July 9, which will be positively the last appearance of Mr. Reeves in Oratorio.

HERR HERMANN FRANKE (founder of the Richter Concerts) announces that he proposes giving a series of twelve Opera performances in the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, during the months of May and June, 1882, when Beethoven's "Fidelio," and (for the first time in England) Wagner's "Meistersinger," and "Tristan und Isolde," will be produced. Herr Hans Richter will conduct all the performances; and the singers will be selected from the principal artists of the chief German opera houses. The costumes, scenery, and entire mise en scène, in connection with Wagner's operas, will be brought from Germany. The orchestra will be that of the Richter Concerts, and will be complete in every detail. As this important artistic undertaking, which it is intended shall be, as far as possible, perfect, necessarily involves considerable outlay, Herr Franke, before making the final arrangements, calls upon all lovers of art to form by subscription a sufficient guarantee fund for the carrying out of the scheme. The contract must be signed by the beginning of August, 1881, and, in order, therefore, to secure the best artists, intending subscribers are requested to send in their names before July 15, 1881. The subscription list is open at the office of Herr Hermann Franke, Director, 2, Vere Street, London, W.; and at the usual ticket agents. We need scarcely say that we wish every success to an undertaking of such high artistic promise.

THE usual special Service at St. Paul's Cathedral on Tuesday in Holy Week, in which Bach's "Passion Music" (the St. Matthew version) occupies an important position, took place this year on the 12th ult. The Service commenced as usual with the Miserere, which throughout was most excellently sung, of course without accompaniment, the alternate verses being taken by the Rev. William Russell, Minor Canon, who maintained the pitch with perfect correctness throughout—a task by no means easy. As in past years, a full orchestra accompanied the Oratorio, the selections from which were the same as heretofore. The chorus singing was remarkably good, notwithstanding the excessive difficulty of the music in places. Two of the treble solos, namely, "Jesus, Saviour, I am Thine," and "See, the Saviour's outstretched arm," were taken by the whole of the Cathedral boys, repeating an experiment tried for the first time last year, and justified, in our opinion, by the acoustic peculiarities no less than the size of the Cathedral. There was a vast congregation, scarcely less than ten thousand persons being present. It only remains to add that the whole of the musical arrangements were, as before, entrusted to Dr. Stainer, who conducted, and that Mr. George C. Martin, Sub-Organist, presided at the organ.

THE arrangements for the Musical Festival at Huddersfield, on the occasion of the opening of the new Town Hall, are now in a forward state of preparation; and a highly successful result may be confidently anticipated. The guarantee fund already amounts to about £3,000; and the dates of the performances are definitely fixed for October 20, 21, and 22. On the first day Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be given in the morning, and a miscellaneous Concert in the evening; on the second day Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" in the morning, and Berlioz's "Faust" in the evening; and on the third day an evening Popular Concert. The following artists have been engaged: Madame Albani, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Trebelli, Madame Patey, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Joseph Maas, Santley, and Frederick King; Mr. Charles Hallé has been retained to conduct the Concerts (the orchestra being composed of his band), and Mr. Joshua Marshall has been appointed chorusmaster. The grand organ in the Public Hall at Newport, Monmouthshire, purchased by the Corporation of Huddersfield, is being taken down, and will be altered and erected in the Huddersfield Town Hall, by Messrs. James Conacher and Sons. The Festival is for the benefit of the Huddersfield Infirmary.

THE fourth season of the Denmark Hill Concerts was brought to a successful termination on Tuesday evening, the 5th ult. Notwithstanding, however, the high artistic excellence of these performances, the audiences have scarcely been as large as could be desired, and we are sorry to learn that Mr. S. Arthur Chappell, under whose efficient management the Concerts have been given, again suffers a pecuniary loss—a matter for regret when the claims which he has upon local support are considered. At the Concert under notice the post of leading violinist was for the third occasion occupied by Herr Joachim, whose imitatively rendered solo was Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor. The pianoforte soli, Nocturne in D flat (Chopin) and Caprice on the Elves' March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Stephen Heller), were excellently interpreted by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who was associated with MM. Joachim and Piatti in Haydn's Trio in G major, No. 5. Signor Piatti also played Bach's Sarabande and Courante from Suite in D; and, in conjunction with MM. Joachim, L. Ries, and Zerbini, in Schubert's Quartet in D minor, Op. 161. The interspersed vocal music was successfully contributed by Miss Marian McKenzie.

A SPECIAL Service was held at St. Stephen's Church, Lewisham, on the evening of Wednesday in Holy Week, at which Mendelssohn's "Christus," preceded by the Overture to "St. Paul," was performed. The orchestral portion of the service was creditably sustained by the band of amateurs known as the Lewisham Orchestral Society, who, under the conductorship of Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, usually assist at these services at St. Stephen's; and Mr. G. C. Martin, Sub-Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, presided at the organ. The choir numbered between eighty and ninety voices.—At the High Celebration on Easter Day, at the same church, Mozart's Mass in B flat was sung, and the effect of the service was very greatly enhanced by the use of a trumpet, which, both in the Credo, Sanctus, and Gloria in excelsis of the Mass, as well as in the processional ("Salve festa dies") and retrocessional hymns, rendered most valuable assistance. It is scarcely possible to overrate the value of the trumpet as an addition to the organ in the accompaniment of church music on all festival, if not also on ordinary occasions, and we gladly give the highest praise to all those who are acting as pioneers in so good a cause.

gramme included Mendelssohn's Thirteenth Psalm and Gade's "Spring's Message," the solo parts of the Psalm being taken by Miss Clara Myers, a young contralto of much promise. A small orchestra, led by Mr. J. L. Kitcat, gave the accompaniments with much taste and precision. The choir, though somewhat weak in the tenor department, was tolerably efficient, Pearsall's unaccompanied part-song, "O who will o'er the downs," receiving an encore, as did also Miss Myers's song, "The oak and the ash," and Mr. A. A. Yeatman's pianoforte solo, "Rigaudon" (J. Raff). Mr. Kitcat played Spohr's Barcarole with his usual success; Mr. George Donnelly gave an excellent rendering of "Pro peccatis" ("Stabat Mater"); and Mr. Charles James sang "Deeper and deeper still," and "Waft her angels," with good effect.

THE prospectus of a grand Fancy Fair and Musical Fête to be held in the arena of the Royal Albert Hall on June 8, 9, and 10, under most distinguished patronage, promises a quaint and novel festival well worthy the attention of all interested in old English pastimes. The Elizabethan period is chosen for the fête; and those who take part in it will be attired in appropriate costumes. At the opening ceremony there will be a procession of children dressed in the old English style; and the characteristic costumes of the many ladies who have consented to preside at the stalls will materially aid the dramatic effect of the scene. Amongst other attractive features provided for the occasion there will be Organ Recitals by Mr. Augustus L. Tamplin; and vocal and instrumental concerts will be given at intervals. The entire proceeds of the fête will be devoted to the fund for completing the new building for the Chelsea Hospital for Women.

THE New York papers are earnest in their praise of the pianoforte performance of Mr. Franz Rummel, who, after a long and successful career in America, is now about to return to England. A large audience assembled at Steinway Hall on the occasion of his farewell Recital, when the programme contained Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata," Mendelssohn's "Andante and Rondo Capriccioso," Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," with selections from the works of Chopin, Schubert, Henselt, Brahms, &c., all of which were played from memory, and elicited the most enthusiastic marks of approbation from the highly critical assembly. We sincerely hope that Mr. Rummel will shortly have the opportunity of displaying before his own countrymen those exceptional talents which have so legitimately earned for him both fame and honour in the New World.

WITH a successful performance of Handel's Oratorio "Samson," the Brixton Choral Society's season was brought to a close on Monday evening last, the 25th ult., at Angell Town Institution, which was occupied by a crowded audience. With the exception of an occasional slight want of precision, the choral numbers were very commendably treated. The music allotted to Delilah was excellently interpreted by Madame Worrell, who in each of her soli elicited well-earned marks of appreciation. Miss Pauline Featherby (Micah), Mr. Henry Guy (Samson), and Mr. Henry Cross (Harapha), were each worthy of decided praise. The accompaniments were played by a small orchestra of strings, supported by Mr. John Harrison at the organ. Mr. William Lemare, who conducted with his accustomed care and ability, announces as the subjects of his benefit Concert in May Clay's "Lalla Rookh" and Cowen's "Rose Maiden."

MR. RIDLEY PRENTICE'S Twopenny Concerts at Kensington Town Hall have, we are glad to find, been thoroughly successful. Twelve Concerts have been given on alternate Tuesday evenings. 750 twopenny tickets for each Concert were sold privately by ladies and gentlemen belonging to the sub-committee, so as to get into the hands of the really poor, and it is stated that 2,000 might readily have been disposed of. The music was always thoroughly appreciated, encores being persistently demanded for generally more than half the items, many of which were classical works. All young vocalists and instrumentalists received fees; well-known artists most generously taking only "expenses."

THE third Report of Dr. Sparrow Simpson, Succentor, to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral, furnishes an interesting account of the work accomplished during the year commencing at Easter, 1880, and ending at Easter, 1881. The list of anthems comprises most of those included in the last report, with many additional ones by modern composers; and the number of services has also been very largely augmented. At the numerous festivals held in the Cathedral several new works have been introduced, the names of which, with their composers, are recorded in the document before us. We regret that space will not allow us to extract from the report; but we are requested by Dr. Simpson to state (in answer to inquiries) that a few copies are still remaining, and that he will be happy to send one to any Precentor or organist who may apply before the stock is exhausted.

ON Friday, the 1st ult., the St. Mary's (Hornsey Rise) Choral Society gave a Concert of sacred and secular music in the Mission Room, Hanley Road, N. The first part consisted of Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," a work that has taken a firm hold among amateur societies, and is deservedly appreciated wherever performed. The solos were well sung by Mrs. A. O. Miller, Mr. J. H. Asman, and Mr. James Budd; and the choral parts effectively rendered by the members of the Society, numbering about sixty voices. A fitting close to a good programme was a choral Patriotic March by Edwin Bending, conducted by the composer. Praise is due to the Conductor of the Society, Mr. Twyford Taylor, for the general efficiency of the chorus; to Mrs. Moodie, who ably presided at the piano, and to Master Fred Hankins for his performance on the harmonium.

ON Tuesday evening, March 29, a Concert was given in the East-End Conference Hall by the Great Assembly Hall Choir from Mile-End Road, assisted by the following soloists: Mrs. F. G. Cole, Mrs. E. Davies, Miss Lydia Vandyke, Miss Kezia Cave, Miss R. Cave, Mr. G. D. Winter, Mr. Frederick Cole, and Mr. George Fortens. The programme comprised Farmer's Oratorio, "Christ and His Soldiers," and selections from the "Messiah" and the "Creation." The choir and soloists acquitted themselves with much credit, special praise being deserved for the "Hallelujah" Chorus, and the "Heavens are telling." Mr. G. Day Winter acted as Conductor and Mr. Duncan Callow accompanied, ably assisted by Miss Rosina Cave, whose first appearance before the public as a pianist was a marked success.

IN aid of the Assistants' Library Fund at the "Bon Marché," Brixton Road, a highly successful evening Concert was given at the Brixton Hall, Acre Lane, on Tuesday, the 12th ult., when the amateur brass band, taking its title from the establishment mentioned, gave its first public performance, under the direction of Mr. James Sprake. Manifestations of warm approbation were elicited by Misses Mary Davies, Lizzie Evans, E. Villiers, Marian Burton; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, James Budd, Frassini, and H. Morley (violin). Mr. Turle Lee discharged the duties of accompanist, and executed two pianoforte solos in his accustomed excellent manner. Judged as tyros, the band referred to may be pronounced worthy of decided commendation. The audience was, we understand, the largest ever assembled at the Hall.

THE London Gregorian Choral Association purpose holding their Annual Festival on Thursday the 19th inst. A mid-day Choral Celebration of the Holy Communion is an addition to the festival programme, which in other respects will, we believe, resemble its predecessors. At the great Festal Evensong in St. Paul's Cathedral a military band is to accompany the voices in addition to the organ.

A SPECIAL Festival Service in connection with the Church of England Temperance Society will be held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Monday evening, the 2nd inst. The musical arrangements have been undertaken by the choir of the Lay Helpers' Association, who will sing the Service written specially for them by Mr. C. E. Miller, and Dr. Bridge's anthem "It is a good thing to give thanks." The Bishop of Bedford will be the preacher.

ON Ascension Day, Thursday, the 26th inst., a special Choral Service will be held in Westminster Abbey in the afternoon, similar in character to those which have there marked this day for the last three years. The selection from "Elijah" will, however, be replaced by Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," which is to be given in its entirety and with full orchestral accompaniment. Dr. Bridge's Evening Service in G, written for the Caxton Celebration four years ago, and repeated at several similar festivals in the Abbey since that date, will again be used. Collections will be made on behalf of the Clergy Orphan Schools. The chancel organ, erected by Messrs. Hill and Son for the Military Bands Festival, will be used on this occasion, and the Conductor will, of course, be Dr. Bridge.

THE competition for the Lady Goldsmid Scholarship, at the Royal Academy of Music, took place on Monday, the 11th ult. The examiners were Messrs. Evers, Fanning, Fitton, Holmes, Jewson, O'Leary, Harold Thomas, Westlake, and the Principal, Professor Macfarren (chairman). There were twenty-two candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Margaret Gyde. At the competition for the Llewellyn Thomas Gold Medal (also on the 11th ult.) the examiners were Messrs. Deacon, Lewis Thomas, and Santley (chairman). There were ten candidates, and the medal was awarded to Annie Grey. For the Evil Prize (ten guineas), competed for on the same day, with the same examiners, there were six candidates, and the prize was won by Frank May.

THE third season of the Richter Concerts will doubtless be hailed with delight by all lovers of instrumental music, professional and amateur, and if the programmes of the remaining eight Concerts are at all equal in merit to that put forward for the opening night, Monday, the 9th inst., a crowded room ought to be the rule on each occasion. This programme comprises the Choral Symphony of Beethoven, a Concerto by Bach, Wagner's "Huldigungs" March, and the Overture to "Oberon"; a selection that should satisfy the most exacting of audiences. The dates of the remaining Concerts are fixed for May 16, 19, 23, and 30, and June 2, 13, 20, and 23, at eight in the evening, except that of May 19, which will commence at three in the afternoon.

WE have much pleasure in noticing the return to this country of a highly gifted young English pianist, Miss Agnes Bartlett, after having most successfully completed a course of artistic study on the Continent. Miss Bartlett has gained the highest distinction at the well-known Dresden Conservatorium, and is, moreover, a pupil of Franz Liszt, qualifications which furnish in themselves a sufficient guarantee for the excellence of her training. During her sojourn in Germany the lady has repeatedly appeared at public Concerts in Dresden and Leipzig, where her talents, both as pianist and composer, have been most favourably spoken of in the local press. We heartily wish the young artist every success in her future career.

BACH'S "Passion" (St. Matthew) was performed at St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square, on Friday, March 25, and also on the 1st and 8th ult. The Narrator's part was most ably sustained by Mr. Harper Kearton at the two first services, and at the last by Mr. Dalzell. The bass music was beautifully and reverently sung by Mr. Frank Pownall. The soprano and alto soli by Masters Carrington and Lake gave evidence of great finish in tone and expression. The choruses and chorals were admirably rendered. That a work of such magnitude could be worthily presented on three consecutive Fridays, without the aid of orchestral colouring, says much for the efficiency of the organ accompaniment by Mr. de M. Sergison.

THE members and friends of the King's Cross Senior Band of Hope gave a successful Concert on the evening of the 14th ult., in Claremont Chapel School-room. The programme contained selections from the standard Oratorios, the solos being given by Miss Tensh, Miss Harwood, Master Hayward, and Messrs. Mason, H. Probert, A. Probert, Langton, and Elvidge. Miss Willcocks presided at the pianoforte, and the string band was under the leadership of Mr. E. C. Robinson. The Concert was much appreciated by a crowded audience.

THE Annual Festival Service of the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy will take place at St. Paul's Cathedral on Wednesday the 18th inst., commencing at half-past three in the afternoon. As many of our readers may be aware, this festival is very frequently the means of adding to the musical répertoire of the Church. This year the novelty produced will be a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis composed specially for the occasion by Mr. Joseph Barnby, the anthem fixed upon being Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's 125th Psalm "All they that trust in Thee, Lord." A full orchestra will, as on past occasions, be employed, Dr. Stainer being the Conductor.

A GREAT novelty in musical instruments, the Rock Harmonicon, has been exhibited and performed upon by Mr. Daniel Till and two sons with much success at the Crystal Palace during the past month. The instrument is formed of stones found on Skiddaw, and has a compass of five octaves. "The stones vary from six inches to four feet in length, and are placed upon bands of straw. The musical sound obtained is particularly rich and melodious, some of the larger stones indeed emitting a volume of sound equal to that of a deep-toned bell. The most effective piece in the répertoire is undoubtedly Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith," with variations.

ORCHESTRAL accompaniments have lately been introduced at St. John's, Red Lion Square, on Festivals and the first Sunday in each month, under the direction of Mr. C. J. Viner, the Organist. On Easter Day selections from the "Messiah," were well sung, the boys' voices being remarkably good. The Communion office was sung to Stainer in A, the fine opening phrase, recurring and announcing the chief subjects of the Creed, being given out by the brass alone with telling effect. The services concluded with Gounod's "Marche Romaine," and the "Cornelius March."

WE regret to record the death of Mr. G. W. Martin on the 16th ult., at Bolingbroke House Pay Hospital, Wandsworth, in his fifty-fourth year. He was one of the choirboys at Westminster Abbey at the coronation of Her Majesty; conducted the National Schools Choral Festival at the Crystal Palace in 1859, and organised a choir of 1,000 voices for the "Macbeth" music at the 300th anniversary of Shakespeare's birth. He also conducted the concerts of the National Choral Society at Exeter Hall. He was the author of eight prize glees, and also edited several musical journals.

THE St. John's Choral Society, assisted by the Athenæum Amateur Orchestral Society, gave a Concert at Holloway Hall on the 8th ult., the first part consisting of Sir Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," the second part being miscellaneous. The soloists were Misses Jessie Royd and Marie Belval, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Thurley Beale; Herr Otto Peiniger (violin) and Mr. Frank Manly (piano-forte). The hall was well filled, and both the Cantata and the miscellaneous selection were much appreciated by the audience. Mr. David Beardwell was the Conductor, and Mr. F. Manly accompanist.

HANDEL'S "Messiah" was given in Christ Church, Westminster Road, on the 5th ult., with full orchestral accompaniment. The vocalists were Madame Florence Lancia, Madame Mary Cummings, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Robert Hilton. The band, thirty-two in number, with Mr. A. Burnett as principal violin, played the accompaniments with delicacy and precision. The choir, consisting of 150 voices, was prompt in attack, and sang throughout with an earnestness deserving of all praise. Mr. F. G. Edwards conducted, and Mr. James Higgs rendered valuable help at the organ.

MR. C. HUBERT H. PARRY'S Cantata, "Scenes from Shelley's 'Prometheus Unbound,'" and Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 9, will form the programme of the Concert of the Cambridge University Musical Society on the 17th inst. At the Chamber Concert on the 13th inst. Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet (Op. 26), Schubert's Pianoforte Quintet in A (Op. 114), and Bach's "Chaconne" will be given, with Messrs. R. Gompertz, A. Burnett, T. P. Hudson, H. Progratsky, and C. V. Stanford as executants.

THE Festival in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund at Bristol is now definitely fixed for June 23, and is to consist of a Choral Service in the Cathedral in the afternoon, and a Concert in the evening in the Colston Hall. In consequence of the success which attended the Society's Festival in Bath two years since, the Choirs will, in returning on the following day, give an afternoon Concert in the Assembly Rooms. Miss Annie Marriott and Madame Florence Winn have kindly consented to take part in the Concerts.

THE Myddelton Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Frank Austin, L. Mus. T.C.L., gave its second Concert on Thursday, March 31, in Wellington Hall, before a large audience. Schumann's "New-Year's Song" was the first item in the programme, the solo singer being Mr. T. Kempton. Mendelssohn's Concerto for Pianoforte, in G minor, was excellently played by Miss Maud May. The second part was miscellaneous. Mr. Austin was presented with a very handsome bâton by the society previous to the Concert.

ON Wednesday the 20th ult. the Richmond Industrial and Fine Art Loan Exhibition at the Castle Assembly Rooms was opened by the Princess Mary of Teck. On a two-manual organ erected specially for the occasion by Messrs. Hill and Son, a selection of music was performed, before the formal ceremony of "opening" commenced, by Mr. George C. Martin, Sub-Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, who afterwards, as the Princess passed from room to room declaring them open, played the National Anthem.

THE following letter (addressed to the Standard) is a sufficient answer to the many reports which have recently been freely circulated:—

Sir,—Having seen an article in your paper of the 18th inst., in which it appears to be implied that I either have retired, or am about to retire, from the exercise of my profession, I take leave to inform you that such is not the case. I am still actively engaged as Conductor of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and am ready to resume my functions as an operatic conductor as soon as I can meet with a manager who will respect alike the public and the musical art.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, M. COSTA.—59, Eccleston Square, S.W., April 23.

THE Mare Street Chapel Musical Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalia" on the 12th ult. The readings were given by the Rev. S. R. Aldridge, B.A., LL.B. Mr. Fountain Meen presided at the organ, Mrs. Smither at the piano and Mr. Arnold Birch at the harmonium. The solo vocalists were Miss Kate Limbert, Madame Bruce, and Miss Dafforne. Mr. Alfred Smither conducted.

AN innovation upon the established custom of playing common-place dance music in our theatrical orchestras during the evening has recently been made at the Court Theatre, the répertoire being now exclusively drawn from high-class chamber music and the orchestral works of the great masters. This is a step in the right direction, and Mr. Wilson Barrett, the lessee, deserves every credit for initiating so desirable a reform.

AN excellent Concert was given on the 12th ult. at the Working Men's Institute, Bermondsey, under the direction of Mr. Stedman. The artists were Miss Millie Turner, Miss Eugénie Faull, Miss Mary Horton, Miss Maud Cathcart, and Miss Alice Frankish, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Stanley Smith, and Mr. E. M. Lott. The vocalists were all successful in gaining the favour of the audience, and Mr. E. M. Lott accompanied with much ability.

A SPECIAL Choral Service for youths will be held in Westminster Abbey, under the auspices of the Church of England Sunday School Institute, on Thursday the 5th inst., at 7 o'clock in the evening. The choir will be reinforced by the boys of the Abbey choir; and the music will include King's Service in F, and an anthem by the late Sir John Goss.

A CONCERT, in aid of the Alexandra Orphanage and the Infant Orphan Asylum at Wanstead, was given by the Lothbury Male Voice Choir at the Cannon Street Hotel, on Friday evening, the 22nd ult. The Choir, conducted by Mr. T. B. Evison, was assisted by Miss Matilda Roby, Miss Helen D'Alton, and Mr. Henry Gadsby (pianoforte).

THE Southwark Choral Society gave a Concert on Tuesday, the 12th ult., at the Horns, Kennington Park, at which Handel's "Joseph" and Cummings' "Fairy Ring" were performed. Mr. J. Courtney was the Conductor.

THE Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's have arranged with the Ancient Society of College Youths to have the fine new peal of twelve bells rung before the morning and afternoon services on every Sunday throughout the year. This will be in addition to and independent of the days for ringing named on the lists already printed, and exhibited in the Cathedral and elsewhere.

A CONCERT by the pupils in Mr. and Madame Bodda's Academy for Singing took place on the 8th ult., and was very successful. Macfarren's Cantata "Songs in a Cornfield" and a miscellaneous selection formed the programme. The execution of the various items showed the effect of careful rehearsal, and applause was liberally bestowed by a numerous audience.

THE following is the result of the Special Musical Examination for Clergy at Trinity College, London, on the 21st and 22nd ult.: Class I. None; Class II. Rev. Seymour Bentley, M.A., Vicar of Markham-Clinton, Newark; Rev. William Jones Evans, Curate of St. Catherine's, Gloucester. The next examination has been fixed for the second week in July.

ON Monday, March 28, a Miscellaneous Concert was given at St. Stephen's Reading Room, East India Road, on behalf of the School funds. Each part of the programme opened with a part-song by pupils from the girls' school, and songs were given by Miss Braine, Miss Cole, Mrs. Briant, Messrs. C. Barton, Harden, and Ames; Mr. Stout contributing two violin solos.

THE Annual Festival of the Church of England Sunday School Institute is to take place at St. Paul's Cathedral on Monday, the 9th inst., at 7 p.m. The choral portion of the service will be sustained by the special Sunday evening choir, and the preacher will be the Rev. W. Boyd Carpenter, Vicar of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate.

A SPECIAL Choral Service will be held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday evening the 12th inst., in connection with the East London Mission, in aid of which a sermon will be preached by the Bishop of Bedford. The musical arrangements are in the hands of the London Church Choir Association.

THE Cheltenham Musical Society will perform J. F. Barnett's Cantata "The Building of the Ship" and a miscellaneous selection (including Hummel's grand Septet in C major, Op. 114) at the second Concert, on the 10th inst., under the conductorship of Dr. Arthur E. Dyer.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ announces his twenty-first series of Pianoforte Recitals to take place at St. James's Hall, commencing on the 6th inst. The Recitals will be eight in number, and will be devoted exclusively to the Sonatas composed by Beethoven for piano alone.

A PIANOFORTE Recital will be given by Madame Grimaldi at the Alexandra Hall, Blackheath, on Tuesday evening, the 3rd instant. The bénéficiaire will be assisted by Mr. Theo. Marzials, who will contribute three of his own new songs.

A SACRED Concert was given at Union Chapel, Islington, on Friday, the 1st ult., by Mr. Fountain Meen, Organist to the chapel, assisted by Mdle. Renz and Mr. Henry Guy. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ.

BACH's "Passion" (St. Matthew) was sung in Brompton Church at the service, on the afternoon of Good Friday, by a choir of fifty voices, in presence of a very large congregation. Mr. Theodore Drew was musical director.

SIR STERNDALÉ BENNETT's "Woman of Samaria" will be sung at St. Mary's, Newington, with orchestral accompaniment, on the 5th inst., under the direction of Mr. W. Lemare.

MR. B. LUARD SELBY has been appointed Organist of Salisbury Cathedral in place of Mr. J. E. Richardson, whose resignation, from ill-health, we announced in our last number.

AT the last meeting of Directors of the Royal Academy of Music, Mr. Henry C. Lunn was unanimously elected a Director of the Institution.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT's Cantata "St. Cecilia" was performed at Hamburg on Good Friday with unqualified success.

REVIEWS.

Akademische Fest-Ouverture von Johannes Brahms. (Op. 80).

Tragische Ouverture von Johannes Brahms (Op. 81).
Clavierauszug zu vier Händen. [Berlin. Simrock.]

THE first performances abroad of these new works by the greatest of living classical composers has already been noticed in THE MUSICAL TIMES, and we may expect a speedy call to discuss them as given by one or other of our own orchestral societies. When the call arrives, an opportunity will be afforded of doing that which would be out of place while passing a mere pianoforte transcription in review. Brahms is not one of the composers to the form and manner of whose orchestral writing an arrangement for four hands can do even a fair measure of justice. We shall, therefore, make no pretence now of estimating the new overtures, as they will have to be judged when presented under proper conditions. It may not be uninteresting, however, to describe, as far as mere words will allow, some of their more prominent features. The Fest-Ouverture begins Allegro in C minor, and somewhat belying its name, is introduced by the graver instruments, sotto voce. A decided Fantasia character appears in the work almost at the outset, due to frequent changes of style, key, and rhythm; the use of arpeggios, and wild leaps from octave to octave. The introductory section is followed by another in which, the key having changed to C major, a broad theme appears, not unsuggestive of a student's song. This leads to the more festal part of the work, the theme being based upon that of the opening section, though the key continues major. Presently an Animato in G major is reached, and a lightsome subject is announced fugally, after which a move is made back to the original key, and to the arpeggios. Presently, however, the composer discards once more the lesser third and settles down to an extremely vigorous piece of work, full of spirit and dash, which, in the Coda, reaches the climax of a perfect swirl of rapid scale passages. The overture is one of marked irregularity in point of form, but there are indications, even on these necessarily bald pages, that every section is elaborate and interesting.

The Tragische Ouverture opens, Allegro ma non troppo, in a way that at once excites attention. Its first chord is the first inversion of D minor; its second, the dominant of D, without the third, while for nine bars the composer coquets with the keys of F and D minor, always refusing its third to the dominant of the latter. Then the C sharp comes, and the movement pursues its decidedly rugged way in a fashion more satisfactory to the ear. The hand of the master is here firm and strong. His passion is deep; yet at the same time tender, and we know not hardly whether we should respond with anger or grief. The preparation for the second subject and the subject itself are altogether beautiful, and so, after the themes have been worked out with abundant vigour, is a lovely, tranquil passage in D major, which seems to speak of peace amid the storm. We are inclined to rank this overture much above its companion. It is a grand work, largely conceived, masterfully wrought, and instinct with feeling. Who will have the honour of first performing it in this country? And why have we need to ask the question?

Six Pièces d'Orgue avec Pédale obligée, par Eugene Gigout, Organiste de l'Eglise St. Augustin.

[Paris: Durand, Schenewerk et Cie.]

THOUGH there be no evidence of decided genius in these six pieces, they are all more or less interesting and likely to be useful. No. 1 is an Introduction and Fugued Theme in B flat minor, of which the fugal movement will command by far the greater attention. It does not assume to be a fugue proper, and the composer has used his liberty to good purpose in the way of an attractive result. M. Gigout writes contrapuntal music with neatness and fluency. No. 2, "Communion," is an Andantino in A major, quite unpretentious, but distinguished by smoothly flowing melody, and, for the most part, natural, unforced harmony. For church use it has distinct recommendations. No. 3, "Marche Religieuse," a Moderato in E flat, verges often on the commonplace. Its themes lack character—as, indeed, do most of M. Gigout's subjects, and there is little in their treatment to make amends. We are much more pleased with No. 4, "Marche Funèbre," a Lento in B flat minor. The general style of this piece is dignified and expressive, without being too cold on the one hand, or too sentimental on the other. Organists, who have not a great choice of funeral marches, will be disposed to welcome this increase of a scanty store. No. 5, "Andante Symphonique," in E major, is, perhaps, more French in style than suits English taste; but its cleverness and undoubted interest should be recognised. As much may be said of No. 6, "Grand Chœur Dialogué," Allegro quasi Maestoso in G. This decidedly brilliant and showy piece will find favour with organists of sufficient executive skill.

St. John the Evangelist. A Sacred Cantata, or Church Oratorio. The words selected from the Scriptures, by the Rev. J. Powell Metcalfe, M.A. The music composed by Philip Armes, Mus. Doc., Oxon.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE have been two great Church uses, belonging to different epochs and coming from seemingly rival sources, yet nevertheless bound together by one purpose—these are the reading of the great Bible of Reformation days, and the earlier Oratorio, both alike aiming at setting forth before the people God's truth and sacred story. The former of these died out before the multiplication of bibles and the increased ability to read them at home; the latter has grown from its infancy, in the simplest possible forms of musical recitation, to the glorious manhood of an "Elijah," a "Mount of Olives," or a "German Requiem," where the voice or voices are intensified by the powerful aid of instruments. But this growth of the Oratorio has had the effect of taking it away from its original use and purpose of intensifying sacred truth and story. If we must give a dreadfully commonplace reason—various instruments need various players, these must needs be paid, and so we get to tickets, and so we get out of church into the concert-room. For many years past, in the earnest desire to put right things in their right places and to their right uses, there has been an ever-increasing effort to bring back Oratorio into church for the edification of the people. There is no doubt that the audiences who now crowd to hear the "Messiah," whenever and wherever it is to be heard, attend in a spirit raised far above the mere concert-going spirit; nor any more doubt is there, that the rapt and solemn attention with which the St. Matthew "Passion" and like works—now, happily, so often heard in our larger churches—are listened to prove that the movement is right, so right, in fact, that we cannot stand still where we are; cannot, in fact, leave the benefit of this revival of the ancient use of the Oratorio to such rich congregations and churches as can afford the cost of a band, or—the only alternative if we do anything at all—maul and disfigure the composer's noble thought, so often largely depending upon orchestral aid, by accompanying all by the one organ tone. In fact we have come to this question: Can we secure for our people the benefits of the true Oratorio with the resources now possessed by the larger churches of our land singly or in association? Dr. Armes, in his new church Oratorio "St. John the Evangelist," has answered this with an emphatic affirmative, giving us a work with the feeling of the present and the learning of the past. Being essentially a church Oratorio, the libretto is so arranged that though in the whole it sets forth by its principal incidents the life of St. John—illustrated by his own words—each separate part, The Call, At the Supper, By the Cross, At the Sepulchre, At the Ascension, Witnessing to the Faith, and The Revelation, can be used by itself as an anthem for different seasons of the Christian year.

The music, written throughout with the special purpose of its performance before a congregation, rather than an audience, has none of those "effects" which are expected in the great massive Oratorios originally designed for voices and orchestra. The real strength, therefore, lies in the sympathetic expression of the words, deepened by that artistic skill which may be confidently relied upon in a composer of Dr. Armes's talent and experience in church music. The solos are extremely melodious, and never beyond the powers of the principals of a tolerably well-trained choir; a great feature in the work being the chorals, the harmonies of which are both musicianlike and appropriate. Many of the choruses—especially “If we walk in the light” (a canon, 4 in 2), and “Hereby we know” (unaccompanied)—contain some masterly writing, the feeling of the text never being sacrificed for undue scholastic display. We are particularly pleased, too, with the Duet for soprano and tenor, “Behold, what manner of love,” and the Quartet, “Blessed are they,” the flowing accompaniment to the latter materially aiding the effect of the voices. The organ part (as may be expected) is remarkably well-written throughout, and although we understand that the work is also scored for an orchestra, it must not be forgotten that the combinations thus attainable formed no portion of the original design.

Practical Harmony: A Manual for the use of Young Students. By W. S. Rockstro. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

MANUALS explaining every branch of music are multiplying so fast in the present day that no student should find a difficulty in obtaining the knowledge necessary for passing an ordinary examination. But it must be remembered that, however musicians may agree upon the use of chords, a very considerable diversity of opinion exists upon their origin; and pupils consequently, when filling up a paper containing a number of questions on the theory of the art, become somewhat nervous as to the particular “system” adhered to by the examiner. When, therefore, we open Mr. Rockstro’s “Practical Harmony” we know perfectly well that we shall meet with the earnest and conscientious thoughts of an accomplished artist; but we also know that these thoughts will be coloured with the opinion of the author, delivered not as opinions, but as facts, by which the student is presumed to build up his musical knowledge. In confirmation of this, Mr. Rockstro tells us in the preface to his book he is “not without hope that beginners, unable to obtain lessons, may, by their own unassisted endeavours, learn from it enough to give them such a fair general idea of the subject as may prove of inestimable use to them in their later studies.” And to show that he desires to help teachers as well as pupils, he says: “For the assistance of any who may make this laudable attempt, we have published a Key to all the Exercises contained in the book, and a series of Questions for Examination; adjuncts which we imagine will be equally acceptable to self-teaching students and tutors of only moderate experience.” There can be little doubt that those “tutors of only moderate experience,” who are compelled to purchase the Key to these Questions in order to teach their pupils how to answer them, can be of no use to any intelligent inquirers into the subject; and we therefore counsel all who do not employ the services of an accredited master to procure the book and work by themselves, assuring them that they will at least find everything logically arranged and clearly explained. To support our assertion, however, that many of the opinions of the author differ from those generally received, we may mention that the chord of the eleventh and the chord of the thirteenth are described as dominant harmonies held over, and resolved upon, a tonic bass. Now, without debating the question whether the figuring given by Mr. Rockstro is the right one, we confidently affirm that when musicians speak of the “chord of the eleventh” and the “chord of the thirteenth,” they mean a fundamental eleventh and thirteenth on the dominant, the resolution being into the tonic harmony. Again, in his chapter “Concerning Retardations” he classes as such those suspensions which resolve upwards. Of course, if it is stated that every suspension must fall to its resolution, some other term must be used to express those which rise; but if a student is made thoroughly to understand that a suspension is a note arrested in its progress, and that, when released, it moves precisely as it would have moved had it not been so arrested, there can be no occasion for subdividing these discords. If we tie a stone to a string and suspend it from the window, when the string is cut the stone falls to the ground; but if we place an air-ball in the same position, as soon as it is released it rises into the air. This is a familiar illustration, but it thoroughly explains the theory of discords of suspension. We have said that the explanations in this book are exceedingly clear; and, although on some points our opinions may not agree with those of the author, we quite think that, from his own point of view, he has fairly made out his case, and that his “Practical Harmony” deserves a warm welcome. Before closing the volume, however, we cannot refrain from expressing a hope that in the note at the foot of page 37, where the “original” root of a chord (which would seem to imply that there is another root) is spoken of, this prefix should be struck out; and we must also mention (with reference to the author’s observations at page 55) that Handel has used the second inversion of the dominant seventh, although we freely admit that he has usually gone out of his way to evade it.

Crotchets and Quaverings. No. 1. By an English Musician. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE author of this pamphlet tells us that he intends to issue a number every month; but as the one forwarded to us is dated “January, 1881,” and we have received none since, we have no means of ascertaining whether this promise has been kept. Unquestionably the worst part of the “letter,” as the writer terms it, is the title, which would scarcely tempt the public to peruse its contents, and certainly would lead no musician to expect some excellent and ripened thoughts upon the state of the art in England conveyed in terse and forcible language. It is very important, in considering the difference between English and foreign concerts, that we should recollect, as we are told in this little essay, that “the explanation is to be found partly in the fact that the concerts are generally given by a Society, instead of an entrepreneur, and still more in the taste of the ordinary public, which in England goes to concerts, and accordingly controls them, while in Germany and France only connoisseurs care for any kind of concert, but the ordinary public still has its musical taste amply satisfied elsewhere, viz., at the theatre.” After mentioning that almost every town maintains a permanent Opera, and at the theatre (which is abroad a municipal institution, where both operas and spoken dramas are given) the services of both instrumental and vocal artists are also required, he truly says that any one who wishes to organise a good concert has the means ready to his hand. Speaking of the proposition of Mr. Villiers Stanford that local orchestras should be formed in this country, he continues thus: “Fancy an English provincial town with a full orchestra resident, and a series of twenty concerts during the winter. What are the players to do on the other 345 days in the year? And how are they to maintain themselves? Will the bassoon and drum players find any teaching to occupy their spare time? In Germany, as I have explained, they would be wanted at the theatre, and on Sundays at the churches; in England they would simply have nothing to do except at occasional concerts, and they would assuredly starve.” We quite agree with our author that the endeavour to “educate” the people by mixing classical music with trashy dances and royalty ballads in the same programme is a mistake, and that is why we have never been able to become eloquent in praise of our English promenade concerts. “Instrumental music, like architecture, is a purely structural art,” it is said, “and depends for its power upon beauty of design; and without some insight into the laws of proportion—without some study of the art—no one will appreciate a Symphony.” This is all undoubtedly true, and we read on until the following passage occurs: “Where then can help be found? In what way is a musician who looks upon the art as something better than a mere trade to do his share in making the English people as celebrated for their music as they are for their poetry, their philosophy, their science, their commerce, and their empire?” Now comes the disappointment: the author has “arrived at conclusions (especially as regards the proper remedy) which will probably very much surprise many musicians.” But the announcement of this remedy, we are told, “must be reserved for another letter.” It is really too bad to propound a riddle and hold over the answer during the author’s pleasure.

Three Pieces for the Pianoforte. Composed by Paul Semler. [Duncan Davison and Co.]

THESE three unpretentious pieces are extremely melodious; and, as light sketches for drawing-room performance, will assuredly find favour with amateur pianists. No. 1,

"Evening Song," has a flowing subject, in 12-8 rhythm, with some effective changes of key. We cannot say, however, that we like the basses at page 3 (last line), which unquestionably move in octaves with the melody, a defect by no means covered because the chords are broken into arpeggios. No. 2, "A Reverie," is a cantabile theme given to the left hand, with a staccato accompaniment for the right. Of the three pieces, however, we prefer the last, "Joyfulness," a melody with the arpeggio accompaniment divided between the two hands, the second part, in the dominant, still preserving this figure, with a different form of arpeggio. All these trifles sufficiently justify their titles to disarm criticism.

My Child. Song, from "Within and Without." By George MacDonald, LL.D. Composed by C.A. Macirone. [Lamborn Cock.]

MISS MACIRONE has wedded a graceful flowing melody to some words excellently adapted for musical illustration; and contralto singers will assuredly thank us for drawing attention to this expressive and poetical song. The voice part is very fully harmonised; and students will find good specimens of the "chord of the thirteenth" at the conclusion of some of the phrases. We can scarcely reconcile to ourselves the harmony of the last bar but one of the song; but it is possible that the engraver may have introduced some confusion amongst the C sharps and C naturals for which the composer is not responsible. The smooth moving harmonies throughout, if sympathetically played, will materially deepen the eloquence of the poetry.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE long looked for première, at the Paris Grand-Opéra, of M. Gounod's new work, "Le Tribut de Zamora," took place on the 1st ult., amidst all the demonstrations of public sympathy which every important novelty from the composer of "Faust" is sure to arouse. The plot of the opera, upon which we have not space here to enter in detail, is laid in Spain during the ninth century, when that country was suffering under the Moorish yoke, thus presenting to the composer an opportunity for bringing into strong relief the contrasting Spanish and Moorish elements. The "tribute" (to explain at least the significance of the title of the new work) consists in a certain number of virgins being handed over annually to the oppressors as a result of the battle of Zamora; first inflicted upon that ancient town only, and subsequently extended also to that of Oviedo. It is in the latter place, and at Cordova, where the different scenes of the drama are enacted. Rare possibilities for a magnificent display of scenery are here suggested by the libretto, which have been fully realised by the decorative artists of the Grand-Opéra. We have already indicated, in our last number, the distribution of the rôles. M. Lassalle, as Ben Saïd, an ambassador of the Caliph of Cordova, and M. Sellier, as Manuel Diaz, a Spanish soldier (two rival lovers), are said to have done the fullest justice to their respective parts. Mdlle. Daram, as Xaima (a Spanish maiden, and the object of their rival affections), is equally highly spoken of. But the Hermosa (a crazy Spanish captive, who, in the end, regains her reason, and is discovered to be the mother of Xaima) of Mdlle. Krauss is regarded as one of the finest creations of that artist, both vocally and histrionically, and is said to have added considerably to the success of the work. The musical interest of the opera would seem to be concentrated chiefly in the third and fourth acts, special effect having been produced by a duet between Hermosa and Xaima in the third, and by a romance of Ben Saïd in the fourth act. The composer, at the end of the performance, was almost overwhelmed with congratulations, bouquets, and similar ovations. The Paris journals, however, although mostly guarded in their criticism, scarcely conceal their disappointment as to the general merits of the new score by the most popular composer of France.

M. Alexandre Guilmant, the excellent organist of La Trinité, Paris, has communicated to us his intention to resume, on the 12th inst., his interesting Organ Recitals in combination with an orchestra, to which we have repeatedly drawn attention in these columns. M. Guilmant has already done much in introducing and popularising the music of Bach and Handel amongst Paris audiences, and we sincerely trust that his renewed efforts in this direction will meet with the success they merit. The performances will take place, as before, at the Trocadéro Palace.

M. Gevaert, the director of the Bruxelles Conservatoire, has been awarded a prize by the Institut de France for his work on the Music of Ancient Greece.

We extract the following from the Daily Telegraph: "Mdlle. Marianne Viardot, the younger daughter of Madame Pauline Viardot-Garcia, the famous singer who created the Fides of Meyerbeer's 'Prophète,' and revived the popularity of Gluck's 'Orphée,' was married to-day (5th ult.) to M. Alphonse Duvernoy, a young composer whose setting of Shakespeare's 'Tempest' recently won the much-coveted prize of the City of Paris. The témoins of the bride were MM. Gounod and Tourgenef, while those of the bridegroom were M. Hérold, the Prefect of the Seine, and M. Ambroise Thomas."

M. Camille Saint-Saëns is, we understand, engaged upon the composition of a new opera entitled "Ines de Castro," for which MM. Silvestre and Détréyat are supplying the libretto. The work is to be first performed at the Paris Grand-Opéra.

At an extra Concert Populaire, conducted by M. Pasdeloup, on the 24th ult., a dramatic Symphony, by Mdlle. Augusta Holmes, entitled "Les Argonautes," was produced for the first time, and very well received. The principal vocal characters in the work, which is divided into four parts, illustrative, as the title would imply, of the adventures of Jason in his search after the Golden Fleece, were sustained by M. Laurent (Jason) and Mdlle. Richard (Medea), both of the Grand-Opéra.

The series of Concerts conducted by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller at the Philharmonic Society of Barcelona has proved in every respect most successful. After the performance of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, with which the last Concert concluded, a crowd of enthusiasts accompanied the veteran German musician to his hotel, where it remained for some time outside until the object of their ovation had repeatedly bowed his acknowledgments from the balcony. A letter, couched in the most eulogistic terms, commemorative of his visit was presented to Dr. Hiller by the artists forming the Society in question, in an elaborate and costly frame, and there can be no doubt that both from an artistic and personal point of view he has every reason to be satisfied with the results of his recent sojourn in Spain.

A commemorative tablet was affixed last month to the house at Raiding, in Hungary, wherein Franz Liszt was born. A large concourse of people assisted in the ceremony, the pianist-composer himself being present on the occasion.

A bust of Richard Wagner was unveiled in the foyer of the Leipzig Stadt-Theater on Easter Sunday. A matinée held by the directors during the ceremony included the poet-composer's "Huldigungs Marsch" and part of "Die Meistersinger"; in the evening a performance of "Lohengrin" took place.

The Bayreuther Blätter, Herr Wagner's organ, contains the announcement that the King of Bavaria has granted to the "Patronat-Verein" the transfer to Bayreuth of the entire orchestral and choral personnel of the Royal Opera of Munich during two months of every year, to commence in 1882, when the first representation of "Parsifal" will, as already announced, take place at the Bayreuth Theatre.

Herr W. Tappert, the able Berlin critic, has just delivered four lectures, with musical illustrations, on "Der Ring des Nibelungen," preparatory to the forthcoming first representation of the tetralogy in that capital.

Dr. Hans von Bülow repeated at Meiningen, on the 2nd ult., his tour de force of performing twice over in the same concert Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Franz Schubert's little-known opera "Alfonso und Estrella," which was revived some time ago at Vienna, with certain adaptations for the modern stage by Capellmeister Fuchs, has recently been performed also at the Carlshaus Hoftheater with much success. Musicians and amateurs from all parts of Germany had assembled to witness the performance of the interesting work.

A new opera by Carl Grammann, entitled "Thunselda und der Triumphzug des Germanicus," was performed for the first time on March 31, at the Dresden Hoftheater, and met with a good reception. A recent performance of the same composer's opera "Melusina" at the Teatro Regio of Turin resulted in a complete fiasco.

The fifty-eighth Music Festival of the Lower Rhine will take place on the 5th, 6th, and 7th of next month at Düsseldorf, under the direction of Herren Julius Tausch and Niels W. Gade. Among the works to be produced during the festival may be mentioned Handel's "Samson," Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," Beethoven's Symphony in A major, Bach's Suite in D major (No. 3), and three works by Gade, viz., a Symphony in B flat major, an overture, "Michel Angelo," and "Zion," for chorus, soli, and orchestra. Madame Norman-Néruda will be among the instrumental soloists.

Anton Dvorák is engaged in writing an opera entitled "Demetrius." A violin concerto by the same composer, dedicated to Herr Joachim, has just been completed.

The four-hundredth representation of Weber's "Der Freischütz" took place on the 26th ult., at the Hoftheater, at Dresden, where for many years the composer was the orchestral director. This would show an average of seven annual performances of the popular work, which, taking into consideration the ample and varied répertoire of the institution in question, may be regarded as not inconsiderable.

Count Geza Zichy, the famous, one-armed pianoforte virtuoso, has just completed a remarkable concert-tour in the larger towns of Hungary, extending over fourteen days, and resulting in the receipt of 10,000 florins intended to be used for charitable purposes. The enthusiastic nobleman has everywhere created a marked sensation by the extraordinary cunning of his only (left) hand and his sympathetic interpretation of the music chosen for his performances.

Viennese journals contain eulogistic notices of a Concert given, on the 1st ult., at the Austrian capital by Mr. Charles Hallé, in conjunction with Mesdames Trebelli and Norman-Néruda, for the benefit of the Conservatorium. The two lady-artists were already well-known to the Viennese public, while the appearance of the eminent pianist, with his great and justly earned English reputation, was looked upon as a rare and special feature, and his interpretation of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat on the occasion in question created accordingly a most marked impression.

An interesting and instructive article on the subject of "Fires in Theatres" is published in Nos. 25 and 26 of the Berlin Musik-Welt, and will be read with advantage by all those responsible for the construction of theatres and similar public buildings.

At Bruxelles two sisters, Jeanne and Louise Douste, aged ten and fourteen respectively, have recently created much enthusiasm among amateurs by their marvellous pianoforte-playing at concerts given in that town.

The season 1880-81 of Subscription Concerts at the Leipzig Gewandhaus closed with the twenty-second performance on March 31.

A collection of autographs by Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Weber, Spontini, Berlioz, Wagner, and other eminent composers, will be sold by auction on the 14th inst. at the Hôtel des Commissaires-priseurs in Paris. Among the most valuable manuscripts may be mentioned the song of Clärchen, from Beethoven's "Egmont" music, the same composer's Finale to the Quartet, Op. 127, five sketches, and a number of letters. The collection is from the library of Herr Johann Kafka, of Vienna.

The following interesting anecdote is related in the Musik-Welt, of Berlin:—

Upon his recent return from Oedenburg to Vienna, Liszt discovered, lying on his writing-table, a huge music-case, bearing on its outer cover a beautiful pen-and-ink drawing: a delicate attention paid him by his countryman, Michael von Zichy. The drawing is superscribed, "Music from the Cradle to the Grave." On its left is represented a young mother singing her infant to sleep; on its right, a bier surrounded by mourners, with a group of mourning choristers in the background. In the centre appears enthroned the Genius of Music, around whom a chorus of angels is arrayed. On the day before his departure Liszt called at the Hotel Erzherzog Karl to thank his friend for the valuable present, handing him, at the same time, a letter he had prepared for the eventuality of Zichy's being absent from home. The letter, written in French, runs thus:—

"Renowned Painter,—You have made me a grand present. Your drawing, 'Music from the Cradle to the Grave,' is a wondrous symphony. I shall attempt to transcribe it in music, and will then dedicate the work to you.—In friendly devotion, FR. LISZT." In his subsequent conversation with Zichy, the maestro declared that he was perfectly serious in regard to this symphony, and that he would ere long take it in hand as his next orchestral work. "I have already planned it in my head," he added; "your drawing has inspired me."

A correspondent of the Daily News writes from Berlin, under date the 24th ult., "Franz Liszt arrived here from Weimar yesterday. He met with an excellent reception at the railway station on his arrival. This afternoon a concert, including some of his masterly compositions, was given in honour of his presence here, at the Central Hotel Winter Garden. On Tuesday he will conduct the music at a concert by the Cæcilien Verein, and also his oratorio 'Christus.' A Liszt evening will be given on Wednesday by Dr. Hans von Bülow in the Academy of Music."

Signor Sgambati, one of the most distinguished pupils of Liszt, and now the young pianist par excellence of Rome, gave an interesting and very successful concert in Florence, on the 11th ult., with the co-operation of the Società Orchestrale. The programme included two of his own compositions, a Symphony in D, dedicated to the Queen of Italy, and a Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Both works were well received, the Concerto in particular gaining enthusiastic applause, being, moreover, considered by far the more valuable of the two from an artistic point of view.

Our Turin correspondent writes: "On Holy Thursday, a Historical Concert was given here by the Stefano Tempia Choral Society, under the direction of Signor Roberti, illustrative of the four great schools of Italian Church-music. The Roman school was represented by Palestrina's 'Impropria' and 'Tenebræ factæ sunt,' Vittoria's 'Nos omnes,' and Allegri's 'Miserere'; the Venetian, by Lotti's 'Crucifixus,' and Marcello's 50th Psalm; the Bolognese, by Clari's 'De Profundis'; the Neapolitan by Stradella's 'Aria di Chiesa,' D'Astorga's 'Stabat Mater,' Leo's 'Dunque si sfoga in pianto,' Pergolesi's 'Sanctum et terribile' and Durante's 'Vergin tutta amor.' The performance was highly appreciated by the audience, and had to be repeated, by generally expressed desire, a few days later." Our correspondent is anxious to vindicate the claims of Turin for a similar exceptional position, as regards the efforts made to reform the prevailing state of sacred music in Italy, assigned to Florence and Milan in the article on this subject contained in our last number. Nor have we, in these columns, ignored the meritorious influence exercised in this direction by the Stefano Tempia Choral Society, under the able conductorship of Signor Roberti, the progress of which we shall continue to follow with much interest.

At Rome died, on March 30, the veteran impresario Vincenzo Jacovacci, for many years the director of the Apollo Theatre, and one of the most prominent figures in the artistic circles of the Italian capital.

Maurice Bourges, an excellent musician and musical savant, died at Paris, at the age of sixty-eight. He was the composer of an opera, "Sultana," produced in 1846 at the Opéra-Comique, as well as of numerous instrumental and vocal pieces of undoubted merit. Bourges was also at one time co-editor of the Gazette Musicale during the brilliant earlier days of that journal. Some excellent translations of the texts of Bach's and Mendelssohn's oratorios, and some of Weber's operas, have likewise proceeded from his industrious pen.

Le Ménestrel announces the death of its able and valued contributor, M. Auguste Morel.

The death is also announced of Baron Max Maria von Weber, the only surviving son of the composer of "Der Freischütz," and author of the standard biography of his illustrious father. We reserve a more detailed notice of the event until our next number.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert Populaire (March 27): Symphonie fantastique (Berlioz); Air (Mozart); Fragments symphoniques (Wormser); Pianoforte Concerto, E flat (Beethoven); Minuet (Boccherini); Tarantelle (Bizet); Overture, "Girondins" (Litolf); Conservatoire (April 3): Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); Air (Mozart); Allegro appassionato (Lalo).

* Contributions intended for this column should indicate clearly the place and date of performance, as otherwise they cannot be inserted.

Finale from "Euryanthe" (Weber); Unpublished Symphony (Haydn); "Hallelujah" Chorus from "Messiah" (Handel); Concert Populaire (April 3); Fragments from "Armide" (Lulli); Fragments from "Dardanus," "Les Fêtes d'Hébé," and "La Mascara" (Rameau); Fragments from "Armide" (Gluck); Châtelet Concert (April 3); "La Tempête" (A. Duvernoy). Concert Populaire (April 10): Fragments from "Armide" (Lulli); Fragments from "Les Fêtes d'Hébé," "Dardanus," and "La Mascara" (Rameau); Fragments from "Armide" (Gluck); Fragments from "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz); Fragments from "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner). Châtelet Concert (April 10): Symphonie fantastique (Berlioz); March from "Ruins of Athens" (Beethoven); Septet (Saint-Saëns) for piano, trumpet, and strings; Orchestral suite, "La Korrigane" (Widor); "Walkürenritt" (Wagner). Concert Populaire (April 24): "Les Argonautes," symphonie dramatique (Augusta Holmes).

Cologne.—Concert-Gesellschaft (April 10): "The Passion," according to St. Matthew (Bach); soloists, Mdles. Schausel and Assmann, M.M. Julius Stockhausen, Westberg, and Dumont; Conductor, Dr. F. von Hiller.

Munich.—Musikalisches Akademie (March 30): Symphony, D minor (R. Strauss); Variations for orchestra on a theme by Haydn (Brahms); Concerto, D minor, for three pianofortes and stringed orchestra (Bach); "Wellington's Victory, or the Battle of Vittoria," for orchestra (Beethoven). Musikalische Akademie (April 10): "Judas Maccabeus" (Handel). Musikalische Akademie (April 17): Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52 (Schumann); Air from "Il Seraglio" (Mozart); "Orpheus," symphonie poem for orchestra (Liszt); Songs (A. Jensen); Symphony, B flat major (Beethoven).

Wiesbaden.—Cur-orchester Concerts (April 1): Concert overture, "Frühlingsklänge" (A. Förster); "Queen Mab" scherzo (Berlioz); Overture to "Julius Cæsar" (Schumann); Symphony, No. 4, C major (Mozart). April 8: Faust-Overture (Wagner); Variations on an original theme (Schubert); Andante and Rondo, from Violin Concerto, No. 5 (Molique); Symphony, A major (Beethoven). April 10: Symphony, No. 4, C major (Mozart); "Faust Overture" (Wagner); "Queen Mab" scherzo (Berlioz); "Burns" Scotch Rhapsody, No. 2 (Mackenzie).

Turin.—Concerto Popolare (April—): Symphony (Beethoven); Scena e ridda Afgana (Biletta); Kaiser Marsch (Wagner); Berceuse (Seligmann); Overture, "Guillaume Tell" (Rossini).

Baltimore.—Peabody Concerts (March 12): Symphony, G minor, Op. 45 (Mozart); Violin Concerto (Beethoven); Songs (Schumann); Minuet and Scherzo for Orchestra (Hartmann). March 26: Symphonie poétique (A. Hameik); Andante and Polonaise for pianoforte and orchestra, and Chant Polonaise (Chopin); Fire Music from "Die Walküre," transcribed by L. Brassin (Wagner); Songs (Lassen); "Fest-Ouverture" (L. Damsrosch). Students' Concerts of the Peabody Institute (March 19): String Quartet, C major, Op. 17 (Mozart); Songs (Schumann); Pianoforte Trio, Op. 5 (Mathison-Hansen). April 2: String Quartet, Op. 1 (Svendens); Cavatina from "Euryanthe" (Weber); Pianoforte Quintet, E flat major (Schumann).

Ottawa (Canada).—Mr. Harrison's Classical Chamber Concerts (February 1 and 7, March 5): Tarantelle, pianoforte duet (Raff); Pianoforte Solos (Handel and Chopin); Trio (N. Gade); Andante and Finale from "Kreutzer" Sonata (Beethoven); Trio, D major (Raff); Quartet, F major (Haydn); Pianoforte Solos (Bach and Schumann); Trio, C minor (Mendelssohn); Songs (Schubert, Mendelssohn, Gounod, Thomas), &c.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHURCH ORATORIO.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Mr. Metcalfe may be assured of "the sympathy and interest" of all those who have at heart the cause of Church music. But it seems to me that sympathy (at least) may well take another direction; I mean toward those who would gladly see such a movement as that to which his letter refers brought to a successful issue in their own neighbourhoods, but are powerless to move in the matter. I have had the privilege of attending on two separate occasions the service now annually held at Cambridge, supported by the united choirs of King's College, Trinity, and St. John's. The effects of the union of so large a body of trained voices is so grand, that any one who has once had the opportunity of joining in such a service, must desire that similar opportunities should be greatly multiplied.

With regard to this particular neighbourhood, I have often wished that the choirs of Lincoln Minster, Boston, and Newark might unite in the manner proposed by Mr. Metcalfe; but my position as an unknown country parson gives me neither right nor power to move in the matter.

However, if you are good enough to publish this letter, it may perchance find its way to the hands and hearts of some whose wishes and opinions on such a matter would have the desired weight.

Yours truly,

Hemingby, Horncastle.

E. S. BENGOUGH.

P.S.—I refer above to the annual Festival service at Cambridge rather than to the very successful effort in the same direction that was made a year or two ago at York, because at Cambridge (as I understand will be the case on the present occasion at York also) the organ alone is used to accompany the voices.

A PLEA FOR THE HARMONIUM.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—On reading your notice of Dr. Stone's interesting lecture "On the Combination of Voices with Musical Instruments," and especially the observations relating to "obligato" instruments of a somewhat obsolete character, I could not help thinking that it would have been still more interesting had the lecturer found it consonant with his arrangements to have given, not only those specimens of instruments and compositions mostly associated with what Longfellow calls "the mouldering past," but also at least one example of the present style of composition, illustrating the manner in which the instrumental or "sensorial" is made to "heighten and adorn" the voice, and by an instrument more suitable to present requirements. You may easily surmise that I refer to the modern harmonium, which is an "orchestral colour-box of itself. When I call to mind the extreme effectiveness of this now popular instrument, in conjunction with the piano and voice, and the comparative ease with which these effects are attainable; and also refer to the many excellent compositions having parts expressly written for it by some of our greatest musicians, notably "The lost chord" (Sullivan), "My Maker and my King" (Stainer), "The children's home" (Cowen), "Farewell" (Engel), &c., I cannot but think that many will probably agree with me that, not only for "music in the house" purposes, but also in the concert-room, the harmonium may fairly lay claim to consideration as an "obligato" instrument of considerable importance. Hoping that my remarks may not be deemed inopportune or obtrusive,

I am, sir, yours faithfully,

EDWARD SNELL.

Kentish Town, April 13, 1881.

RUSSIAN THEMES IN BEETHOVEN'S QUARTETS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In the new part (XIII.) of Grove's "Dictionary of Music," just issued, under the article "Rasoumowsky," it is stated, à propos of the Russian themes used in two of Beethoven's Quartets, Op. 59, that "the names and forms of these two themes do not appear to have been yet identified." I may, therefore, perhaps be rendering some service in calling attention to the fact that the second one quoted (in E major) may be found with literal accuracy (only in A, instead of in E) in Köhler's "Album National Russe" (No. 565 of Litoff's Collection), with a Russian title, which I am not linguist enough to be able to translate. It is No. 175 in the "Album." The other theme (that in D minor) is not found in the Album with the same accuracy, but the first eight bars of No. 188 seem to have a resemblance too striking to be accidental. May I add that the Album from which I have quoted will be found very useful and interesting to those who desire to make acquaintance with Russian "Volkslieder."

I remain, sir, yours faithfully,

April 16, 1881.

R. WESTCOTT.

A HINT TO COMPOSERS AND PUBLISHERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you permit me, through your columns, to call attention to the paucity of good and easy duets for mixed voices in the catalogues of our music publishers? I feel confident that this is a case in which the supply would produce, or at least vastly increase, the demand. Such compositions as "La ci darem," "Crudel perchè," and "The sailor sighs," may be mentioned as models; and as it is for teaching purposes that many other singing-masters besides myself would buy such works if they were to be had, I would suggest that all crudity, both in melody and harmony, should be avoided; that they should be tuneful, adapted to voices of strictly limited compass, and that the general standard of difficulty should be somewhat lower, rather than above, that of the examples cited.

It may be that more compositions of this class are in print than I suppose. If this is really so, it would, I think, pay their proprietors to make the fact public through your advertising columns, especially if they take care to indicate the lowest and highest notes in each part.

I am, sir, yours truly,
A. ORLANDO STEED.

In consequence of the pressure on our columns we are compelled to omit several interesting communications.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

. Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

F. S. ORAM.—Our own opinion is that "Andantino" means not so slow as "Andante", but many assert that it has exactly the opposite signification. The question is whether the diminutive in diminishes the force of the original word, or the velocity of the movement which the word indicates.

CARMINS.—Apply, stating every particular, to any well-known professor of singing. We cannot, of course, reply to such questions.

H. P. WADDINGTON.—We can offer no opinion on the matter; but certainly have known few vocalists who are also performers upon brass instruments.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABINGDON.—On Tuesday, the 19th ult., the Musical Association assisted by a small but efficient orchestra, led by Herr Morsch, of Eton, gave a Concert consisting of Bennett's Woman of Samaria and a miscellaneous selection. There was a good audience. The solos in the work were well rendered by Mrs. Kendall, Mrs. King, Miss Florence Clarke (to whom especial praise is due for her artistic singing in the contralto music), Mr. Hodgson (of Magdalen College, Oxford), and Mr. J. H. Clarke. Herr Morsch played a solo for violin, exhibiting great powers of execution. Mr. F. K. Coudry conducted with his usual ability.

ASHFORD.—The ninth Easter Oratorio performance by the Ashford Church Choir, was given in the Corn Exchange on Thursday evening, the 21st ult., before an audience of between six and seven hundred persons. The vocalists consisted exclusively of members of the choir, who proved themselves quite equal to the three important works, principally choral in their structure, selected for the occasion. These were the 137th Psalm, "By the Waters of Babylon" (Goetz); the sacred Cantata, God, Thou art Great (Spohr); and Beethoven's Mass in C. The voices were supported by two grand pianofortes and a harmonium, the players being, at the former, Mr. F. Cliffe, of Kensington, and Mr. A. Legge, organist of Ashford Church; while Mr. James Higgs, of London, was at the harmonium, the excellence of the accompaniments contributing largely to the great success achieved. The instrumental combination was further displayed in the first movement of Schubert's Symphony in B minor, given as an introduction to the Psalm. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, and included Handel's Sonata in A major, for violin and piano, the violin played by Mr. James Lauder, and Mr. Cliffe sustaining the pianoforte part. Dr. Wilks, the honorary precentor of the choir, most ably conducted. At the close, Sir Edward Watkin, M.P., proposed a vote of thanks to Dr. Wilks and the choir, which was carried by acclamation. A collection towards defraying the expenses realised £42 os. 9d.

BELFAST.—The members of the Choral Association, under the patronage of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the Mayor, and élite of Belfast, gave the closing Concert of the sixth season to a crowded audience, in the Ulster Hall, on Friday evening, March 25. The principal item was Dr. Stainer's Cantata, The Daughter of Jairus, to which full justice was done by Miss Larkcom, Mr. Dalzell, and Mr. T. Kempton. Mr. G. Blunden presided at the organ, and the choir of 150 voices was under the experienced conducting of Mr. W. J. Kempton. In the miscellaneous selection, vocal solos were contributed by Miss Larkcom, Miss Damian, Mr. Dalzell, and Mr. Kempton. The choir was most successful in a new part-song, "Phillie," composed for the Concert by Mr. Walter Hay; and Mr.

Blunden played in masterly style the Overture to William Tell.—The concluding Concert of the present season of the Philharmonic Society took place on the 1st ult. in the Ulster Hall, and was very well attended. The solo singers displayed talents of a high order, besides giving evidence of the training to which they have been subjected under the Conductor of the Society, Herr Adolf Beyschlag. The choruses and part-songs were on the whole given with care and precision. The Cantata, which occupied the first part of the programme, was Jackson's The Year, a composition possessing many attractions for amateurs. The accompaniments by the band were throughout played most tastefully, and the singing of the solos gave proof of the large resources of the Society. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, including pianoforte solos by Herr Beyschlag.

BIRMINGHAM.—The Festival Choral Society gave its last Concert for the season in the Town Hall on Thursday, March 24. The work chosen was Handel's Samson, with Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, Signor Foli, and Mr. Pountney as vocal principals; the band and chorus of the Society were in strong force; Mr. Stimpson was organist, and Mr. Stockley conducted. The soloists were in excellent voice, and rendered their parts with fine effect, while the chorus singing was at times grand in the extreme. There was a large audience.—Mr. Pyatt gave a grand Chamber Concert in the Town Hall on Tuesday, March 29, MM. Joachim, Ries, Zerbin, and Piatti forming the quartet of strings; Miss Agnes Zimmermann the pianist, and Mr. Maas vocalist. The concerted pieces were Mozart's Quartet in D minor (Op. 10, No. 2), and Beethoven's Trio in C minor (Op. 1, No. 3). Miss Zimmermann gave a highly poetic rendering of Chopin's Ballade in A flat; and MM. Joachim and Piatti executed solos in irreproachable style. Dr. Heap accompanied Mr. Maas, who gave as one of his solos Dr. Heap's setting of "Annabel Lee." The audience, although not large, was very appreciative.—Handel's Messiah was performed at the Church of the Saviour on Tuesday, March 29, by the Midland Musical Society, with Mrs. G. F. Oughton, Miss Bishop, Mrs. Forrest Currie, Mr. S. Roper, and Mr. Lusted as soloists, and band and chorus under the direction of Mr. H. M. Stevenson. Mr. W. G. Halliley presided at the organ.—The Philharmonic Union concluded the season with a miscellaneous Concert in the Town Hall on Thursday, March 31. The principal item was Handel's serenata, Acis and Galatea, which, with Miss Giulia Warwick, Mr. G. H. Welch, Mr. W. Whiston, and Mr. D. Harrison as soloists, was very well performed. In the second part the most important feature was Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, which was finely rendered by Dr. Heap.—The Carl Rosa Opera Company gave six performances at the Theatre Royal, commencing Monday, the 4th ult. Ambrose Thomas's comic Opera, The Cadi, and Ponchielli's I Promessi Sposi were introduced for the first time with success.—Mr. Stratton brought his season of Popular Chamber Concerts to a close on Tuesday, the 5th ult. The programme comprised Quintet in G, Op. 3, pianoforte and strings (E. Prout), first time in Birmingham; Variations, Op. 21, piano and flute (Moscheles); Quartet in G minor, Op. 4, strings (Spohr); Sonata in D, Op. 9, pianoforte (Dussek); and Trio in G minor, Op. 63, pianoforte, flute, and violoncello (Weber). The strings were the same as before, Mr. Stratton was the pianist, and Mr. Langston flautist.—On Good Friday the Messiah was performed at the Town Hall by the Philharmonic Union, with organ accompaniment only. Miss Clara Samuell, Madame Poole, Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. J. H. Blower were the principals, and Dr. Heap conducted. The same day a grand performance was given at Aston Lower Grounds, with full band and chorus of the Holte Choral Society; and Miss Mary Davies, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Ludwig as principal vocalists. Mr. C. J. Stevens conducted. Both performances were fully attended, at Aston some four thousand persons being present.—Mr. Stockley's last Orchestral Concert for the season took place in the Town Hall on Thursday, the 21st ult. The programme included Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; Cowen's Suite de Ballet, "The Language of the Flowers" (first time in Birmingham); the Overtures, Fra Diavolo and Oberon; and a new and clever Concert Overture by Mr. F. Ward, composed expressly for the Concert. Miss Annie Marriott and Signor Foli were the vocalists.

BOURNE.—On Thursday evening, the 21st ult., a very successful Concert was given in the Corn Exchange by the members of the Choral Society, assisted by several ladies and gentlemen from the neighbourhood. The first part of the Concert was devoted to Sterndale Bennett's May Queen. The solos were sung by Mrs. Daglish, Miss Maude Farebrother, Mr. Cundy, and the Rev. M. F. Short. Miss Bell presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Wolstencroft at the harmonium. The choruses were well sustained by the members of the Society, and great credit is due to the Conductor, Mr. Lewis, for the satisfactory manner in which the Cantata was performed. The second portion of the Concert was miscellaneous, the principal feature of which was a song composed by Mr. Lewis and sung by Miss Bell. The Concert was for the benefit of the Conductor.

BRIGHTON.—A performance of Handel's Messiah was given at the Pavilion Dome, on March 31, and attracted a large audience. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Osgood, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Signor Foli, all of whom sang with even more than their accustomed effect throughout. The choruses were finely given by Mr. Kuh's Festival Choir. Mr. King was the Conductor, and the Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Val Nicholson, was everything that could be desired. Mr. Crapps presided at the Organ.—An evening Concert was given by the Amateur Choral Society on Tuesday, the 5th ult., for the benefit of Mr. William Pullen, the energetic Conductor. Among those who took prominent parts were Miss Ada Phillips, Miss Fanny Cash, Miss Annie Burton, Mr. Stephen Cowley, Mr. W. H. Judd, Mr. Westfield, and Mr. W. Pullen. The orchestral pieces were well given on the whole, under the leadership of Mr. G. L. Ellis. Mr. W. Pullen conducted, and Misses E. Beves and A. Neall were the accompanists.—Special Services for the Volunteers in Brighton for the Review, were given on Easter Sunday, in the Dome. The huge platform was arranged as a sort of improvised choir, an altar rail running along the front, with reading desk and impromptu pulpit, and altar seats behind. The Venerable Archdeacon Hannah, D.C.L., the Acting Chaplain of the 1st Sussex Artillery Volunteers, officiated, assisted by the Rev. G. Cotterill, M.A., Brighton College, Rev. E. K. Gray, Hon. Chaplain of the 2nd South Middlesex R.V., and the Rev. E. H. Nelson, Acting Chaplain of the 3rd Middlesex A.V. The choir, consisting of 100 voices, was selected from the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society, Mr. George Watts's Philharmonic Society, and Mr. Kuhe's Festival Choir; all being under the direction of Mr. R. Taylor, organist of Brighton College, who also officiated at the organ. Before the service commenced, the 1st Sussex Artillery Volunteers played, as an introductory voluntary, Viviani's "Silver Trumpets." Then followed the Easter hymn, "Jesus Christ is risen to-day," led by the choir, and sang by the vast assembly with extraordinary precision. The anthems and chants for the day included the grand chant of Humphreys, the Psalms ii., lviii., and cxi., a major chant of Russell's, the second to a minor chant of Croft, and a third another major chant of Russell's. The lessons were followed by the Te Deum and Benedictus, both especially composed for this occasion by Mr. R. Taylor. A new setting of the hymn "Onward, Christian soldiers," the composition of Mr. Taylor, was also sung, and though it was, of course, quite new to nearly all present its simple character enabled all to join in it readily and heartily. The choir next sang the "Hallelujah Chorus" from the Messiah, and after the Benedictus had been pronounced by the Ven. Archdeacon, the National Anthem was sung, first by the choir, and then by the assembly.

BRISBANE, QUEENSLAND.—The report of the Brisbane Musical Union, presented at the last meeting of the members, shows that the Association is in a flourishing condition, both financially and artistically. Four Concerts were given during the past year, at which were performed the Hymn of Praise, Last Judgment, Samson, St. Paul, and Israel in Egypt; and the works selected for the Concerts during the season now entered upon are Beethoven's Engedi, Van Bree's St. Cecilia's Day, Mendelssohn's Elijah, Smart's Bride of Dunkenrover, Macfarren's May-Day, Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, and Macfarren's Outward Bound. We heartily congratulate the members of the Society on the success of their zealous efforts in the cause of the promotion of good music.

BRISTOL.—On Monday, March 28, the eleventh of Mr. Riseley's popular Concerts, for the present season, was given in the Colston Hall, and extremely well attended. The principal items in the programme were Romberg's Symphony in E flat, the Overtures Fes-sonda (Spohr), Lestock (Auber), and La Cenerentola (Rossini), and Mr. J. F. Barnett's Tone picture, "The Ebbing Tide," all of which were splendidly performed. In the absence of Mrs. J. L. Roedel, who was announced to play Beethoven's Concerto in C, for pianoforte and orchestra, Mr. Roedel played the first two movements of Hummel's pianoforte Concerto in E. The vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna, Mr. W. Thomas, and Mr. J. F. Nash; and Mr. Riseley conducted. On Saturday, the 9th ult., two Concerts were given in the Colston Hall by the band of the 2nd Life Guards, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Winterbottom. The programme included the Overtures, Poet and Peasant (Suppé) and Masaniello (Auber), and various other works of a popular character. Mr. Riseley accompanied the band at the organ in Mendelssohn's "War March of the Priests" and Costa's "Triumphal March" (from Naaman), and in Rossini's "Cujus animam" (Stabat Mater), and Gounod's Entr'acte, "La Colombe." Miss Kate Hayes was the vocalist. On Thursday, the 14th ult., two Concerts were given in the Colston Hall by the fine band of the Coldstream Guards, under the conductorship of Mr. C. Thomas. The programme at each Concert was thoroughly good, and the performance of the band was much enjoyed. In Julien's "British Army Quadrille" assistance was given by some local bands and the Pipers of the Scots Guards. Miss M. Burton was the vocalist. On Good Friday the same band gave two excellent Concerts of sacred music at the Colston Hall, both of which were well attended. Mr. Riseley presided at the organ, Miss M. Burton and Mr. Chandler were the vocalists, and Mr. C. Thomas conducted.

CORK.—A most successful Concert was given by the members of the Musical Society, in the Assembly Rooms, on the 5th ult. The music was good, and well rendered, and the audience large and appreciative. The first part was devoted to Gade's Cantata, The Crusaders, the principal parts being taken by Mrs. Uppington, Mr. R. M. Keatinge, and Mr. J. Sullivan, all of whom were highly efficient. The choral portions of the work were well given, under the conductorship of Dr. Marks. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous.

CREWE.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave their second and last Concert of the present season in the Town Hall, before a large and appreciative audience, on Tuesday, March 29, when Handel's Oratorio, Samson, was performed for the first time in Crewe. The principal artists were Miss Henrietta Tomlinson, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. D. Harrison. The choir was augmented by members of the Stoke Philharmonic Society, and the orchestra by a strong contingent from the bands of Messrs. Hallé and De Jong. The solos were remarkably well rendered; and the effective manner in which the choruses were given reflected the highest credit on Mr. F. James, the Conductor. The band, under the leadership of Mr. H. Sedgwick (Bury), proved very efficient. Mr. G. Young rendered valuable service at the harmonium.

DUDLEY.—A performance of Handel's Messiah was given in the Public Hall on Tuesday, the 19th ult., by the members of the Vocal Union. The principal vocalists were Mrs. J. Barlow, Miss E. Bailey, Messrs. T. J. Young, W. H. Smith, and E. S. Tipper. The band and chorus numbered nearly 100 performers, and the rendering of the work gave the utmost satisfaction to a numerous and appreciative audience. Mr. James Hale's orchestral band played the accompaniments, and Mr. B. Barlow conducted.

DUNFERMLINE.—On the 19th ult. the Dunfermline Choral Union gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah to a large audience in St. Margaret's Hall. The choir consisted of 120 voices, and there was an efficient orchestra under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Cole. Mr. W. H. Richmond presided at the organ, and Mr. W. Harrison was Conductor. The principal soloists were Mrs. A. C. Haden, Miss Mullan, Messrs. Banks, Moodie, and Bower. The balance of voices has very much improved since last year, and all the choruses were fairly rendered, although at times they were slightly overpowered by the organ. Mrs. Haden gave a fine dramatic rendering of the air,

"Help me, man of God," and the great scena, "Hear ye Israel," and the other soloists acquitted themselves very fairly. The Concert proved a great success.

DUNSTER.—On Thursday, the 7th ult., a Special Service was held in the Parish Church of St. George, when Mozart's Mass, No. 12, was performed as the anthem by a band and chorus of about ninety. The Mass was admirably given, and Sullivan's arrangement of St. Ann's tune, with orchestral accompaniment, was also very effective. The orchestra, which consisted of over thirty performers, played the Andante ("Pilgrim's March") from Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," as the introductory voluntary; and Handel's Overture to Esther, at the close of the service. The shortened form of service was used (without sermon), the Rev. R. U. Todd (Rector of Dunster) intoning. The leader of the band was Dr. Mackenzie, the Conductor the Rev. W. Hook (Rector of Porlock), to whose exertions much of the success was due; and Mr. John Warriner, A. Mus. T.C.L., Organist of the Church, presided at the organ.

EDINBURGH.—Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley gave an Organ Recital on Saturday evening, March 26, in the Music Class-room. The Recital was specially to the University Musical Society and their friends, only a few others being invited, including the vice-presidents of the Society, members of Fettes College, and ladies from several scholastic establishments. The programme mainly consisted of varied and interesting elements comprised in the selection for the annual Concert of the University Musical Society, and included some vocal solos, which were excellently sung by a student of the University. The fourteenth annual Concert of the Edinburgh Musical Society was given in the Music Hall on March 29, supported by a select orchestra of fifty performers, including some of the leading musicians of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Manchester, headed by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie; Sir Herbert Oakeley being Conductor. The programme opened with the students' song, "Gaudeamus igitur" (which was extremely well sung), after which Handel's Overture to Alexander's Feast was played by the orchestra with steadiness and expression. Several part-songs and glees were effectively rendered, and a student with a good baritone voice was highly successful in some vocal solos. Of three Scotch melodies arranged by Sir Herbert for the Concert—"Ye banks and braes," "The boatie rows," and "Here's to the year that's awa'"—the last proved the most pleasing. Orchestral parts were written by the Professor for the choral pieces, which greatly enriched the effect of the singing. The programme also included, amongst the orchestral works, Mozart's Symphony in E flat.—The usual Recital of sacred music, announced by the Edinburgh select choir for performance on Fast Day evening, was given in the Music Hall, when a programme comprising anthems, part-songs, hymns, motetts, and sacred airs was carried through, much to the enjoyment of a large audience. Mr. Hartley is to be congratulated on a marked improvement in the choir. The solos were judiciously chosen, and well rendered by Miss Moir and Mr. Smith. An organ solo was contributed by Mr. John Hartley.

ENNIISKILLEN.—On Easter Sunday the following selection was sung in the parish church: Matins—Venite or Easter Day to Humphreys' grand chant in C; the special psalms to Marsh in A; Te Deum and Jubilate to Jackson's Service in F; during Offertory, "But Thou didst not leave" (Messiah); anthem after third Collect, Berthold Tours' "God hath appointed a day"; Doxology arranged from Tallis by the Choirmaster, Mr. Arnold; Kyrie, Kramer in E flat.—Mr. Arnold's sixth Concert was given in the Town Hall on Friday, the 22nd ult., before a crowded audience. The Enniskillen Church choir were particularly successful in all their pieces, and Mr. Arnold's newly formed string band was an especial attraction. In some instrumental pieces Mr. Arnold was assisted by his clever young son and Miss Graham; and Mr. Hendrey also gave solos on the flute. Miss Fannie Sellers was highly appreciated in her songs, receiving an encore in each instance, the other vocalists being the Misses Graham, Messrs. W. C. Trimble, and E. A. McQuire.

FYLL.—The third Concert of the Levuka Choral Society was given in the hall of the Institute on January 14, when a selection of glees, and a portion of Wallace's Maritana were performed. The glees and choruses were efficiently rendered by the choir, under the direction of Mr. George Moore, "By Celia's Arbour," and "From Oberon in Fairyland," being especially successful. Solos were contributed by members of the choir.

FOLKESTONE.—A very fine rendering of Haydn's Passion Music was given at the parish church on Wednesday, the 13th ult., in the afternoon and evening. The choir was largely augmented, and the solos were sung in a very refined manner by a quartet under the direction of Mr. Kempton, of St. Paul's Cathedral, viz., Master Probert (treble), Mr. Frost (alto), Mr. Dalzell (tenor), and Mr. Kempton (bass). The organ was supplemented by a string band led by Mr. Prague. A word of praise is due to the choir for the careful manner in which they took up their leads, and sustained their parts throughout. Miss Morgan presided at the organ, and Mr. Dugard (the Organist and Choirmaster) conducted with much precision.

GEORGETOWN, DEMERARA.—A selection of Sacred Music was given in St. Philip's Church, on Tuesday evening, March 1, to an audience numbering more than 1,200 persons. The solos were especially well rendered, and the fine choir, under the able direction of the Rev. Mr. Castell, gave the two choruses, "To Thee, great Lord" (Rossini), and "The heavens are telling" (Haydn), in a very finished style. Mr. Edwin Rake played with his accustomed ability the organ solos and accompaniments.

GRANGE.—The members of the Grange Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's Messiah on Monday evening, the 18th ult., at St. Paul's, Grange, under the conductorship of Mr. Sewell. The Society was strengthened by assistance from Yorkshire, as well as from Ulverstone and Barrow, and the choruses were given with correctness and power. The airs and recitatives were sung by Miss Tomlinson, Miss Wakefield, Mr. H. Taylor, and Mr. Ainsworth. Mr. H. B. Sewell led the band, Mr. Robinson was solo trumpet, Mr. Threlfall, organist of St. Paul's, presided at the organ, and Mr. E. Sewell conducted. The proceeds of the collection were devoted to the fund for the erection of a church tower and a peal of bells.

GREAT MARLOW.—A Concert was given here on Thursday evening, the 21st ult., under the direction of Mr. F. W. J. Chaundy. The first part consisted of Van Bree's Cantata, St. Cecilia's Day, the solos being very effectively rendered by Miss Marianni Jones. The choir acquitted itself very satisfactorily, a small but efficient orchestra greatly adding to the effect of this charming little work, which deserves to be better known among amateurs. The second part included a Symphony of Haydn's, and several other instrumental pieces, and songs by Miss Jones and Mr. J. F. Probert.

GREENOCK.—A highly successful Oratorio Concert was given by the Choral Union on Tuesday evening, the 5th ult., in the Town Hall, when Haydn's Creation was performed. The soloists were Miss Irvine, Mr. J. T. Murray, and Signor Foli, and the Organist Dr. A. L. Peace. The bass solos were excellently sung by Signor Foli, and Miss Irvine and Mr. Murray made a very favourable impression. The fine choir fully sustained the high reputation gained under the able Conductor, Mr. J. Westwood Tosh. The accompaniments were ably played by Dr. Peace. On Thursday, the 14th ult., the Greenock Tonic Sol-fa Harmonic Society gave a performance of Fawcett's Oratorio, Paradise, in the Temperance Institute. The solo parts were well rendered by Miss C. M. Killgour, Miss Joan Hinshillwood, Mr. George Easton, and Mr. George Spraggan. In the choral portion the most effective was the concluding chorus, "Glory to God in the highest." Mr. R. F. Easton rendered efficient aid by his accompaniment on the harmonium, and Mr. John McCallum conducted.

INVERNESS, N.B.—On Tuesday, the 10th ult., the members of the Philharmonic Society (Amateur) gave their sixth Concert. The Society numbered over 100 (inclusive of sixteen instrumentalists). The principal works in the choral selection were Mozart's Motett, No. 1; Mendelssohn's Motett, "Hear my prayer," and the Trio ("Mine inmost heart") and Chorus, "Hallelujah" from Beethoven's Mount of Olives. The chief orchestral works were Haydn's Symphony, No. 11; "Air de l'Eglise" (Stradella); a Serenade by Haydn; and "Serenade de Mandolines" (Desormes). The programme also included, among other numbers, Gounod's "Evening Hymn," with viola obbligato; the bass solo "Arm, arm ye brave," (Judas Macca-beus); Blumenthal's "Venetian Boat-song"; and Adam's "La Retour de la Montagne," with violin obbligato; which were all successfully rendered. The Conductor of the Society is Mr. J. H. G. Money, Organist of the Cathedral of St. Andrew, Inverness.

IRVINE.—On Thursday evening, the 14th ult., an Organ Recital and Concert was given in the Parish Church by Mr. Hinchcliffe, the Organist, assisted by Miss Irvine and Messrs. Higgins and Johnstone, vocalists. The programme was a varied one, and consisted of the Overture to the Occasional Oratorio, "There is a green hill far away," Andante in G, by Batiste, grand Offertoire in G, by Wely, Scotch Airs, and a grand March by Morgan, all of which were well played by Mr. Hinchcliffe. Miss Irvine, who has a fine soprano voice, sang with much effect "Angels ever bright and fair," "Should he upbraid," and "Charming May." Messrs. Higgins and Johnstone possess good voices, and sang remarkably well. Altogether, the Recital was a great success.

KELSO, N.B.—Mr. Alfred Heap delivered a Lecture in the High School, on the 6th ult., before a large audience, on the "Ballads of England." Misses Mackenzie and Mein enhanced the enjoyment of the Lecture by their artistic rendering of a number of old ballads. Haydn's Creation was performed in the Corn Exchange on the 7th ult., by the Choral Union, before a large audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Mackenzie and Messrs. Nulton and Ingham. Herr Dambmann led a very efficient orchestra, and Mr. Alfred Heap conducted.

KILMARNOCK.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah in the Corn Exchange Hall, on the 15th ult., before a crowded and enthusiastic audience. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Smith, Miss Fyfe, Mr. Charles Blagbro, and Mr. R. E. Miles, R.A.M., all of whom gave an excellent rendering of the solos allotted to them, the arduous part of the Prophet being sung with much effect throughout. The choruses were admirably given, and the accompaniments efficiently played by a well-appointed orchestra from Glasgow, under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Cole; Mr. Newsome, Stonehaven, ably presiding at the organ. After the Concert the members of the Society assembled in the Athenaeum, where the Conductor, Mr. Newsome, was presented with a testimonial consisting of an elegant gold watch and an ebony bâton, handsomely mounted with silver.

KINGSTOWN.—On Friday evening, the 8th ult., the members of the Philharmonic Society gave the second Concert of the eighth season, in the new Town Hall, with much success. The programme was well selected, and consisted entirely of sacred music. The first part included "A Song of Peace," by Arthur Sullivan (with band accompaniments written for the occasion by the Conductor), and a selection from Haydn's Creation, in which the chief items were "With verdure clad" (splendidly sung by Miss Connell, R.I.A.M.), "In native worth," and the chorus "The heavens are telling." The second part consisted of Mendelssohn's Athalie, which was given in its entirety with a precision and power that delighted all present. The orchestra specially deserves praise for the fine rendering of the Overture, War March, and accompaniments, and the singing of the chorus throughout the evening reflected the highest credit on the Conductor, Dr. T. R. G. Jozé. The solo music in Athalie was done ample justice to by Miss Connell, a lady amateur, and Mrs. Bernard Wiseheart. The chorus and orchestra numbered 100 performers.

LEAMINGTON.—On Tuesday evening, the 5th ult., the Leamington Philharmonic Society gave a very successful performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio Elijah. The principal singers were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Burton, Mr. Hanson, and Mr. Kempton, of St. Paul's Cathedral. In the Widow scene Miss Larkcom sang with considerable dramatic feeling, and her rendering of "Hear ye, Israel," created a marked effect; Miss Marion Burton gave the contralto solos with true artistic expression, and received an encore for "O rest in the Lord"; and the tenor songs, "If with all your hearts" and "Then shall the righteous shine," were excellently sung by Mr. Hanson. Mr. Kempton's voice is admirably suited for the music of the Prophet in the mocking phrases "Call him louder," in the great song, "Is not his word like a fire," and in the touchingly plaintive prayer to the Deity "It is enough" he was equally successful, and elicited warm and well deserved applause. Mr. Belcher, of Birmingham, was leader of the band, and Mr. Ward, to whom the credit is due for having given the Society a careful training, officiated as Conductor.

LEEK.—The Tonic Sol-fa Association gave its fifth Concert on the 12th ult., in the West Street Room. Handel's Acis and Galatea formed the first part, and the performance was highly creditable to all concerned, many of the choruses being given with admirable precision and effect. In the soprano solos, Miss Pattie Standen acquitted herself most successfully. Mr. Dumville gave a musicianly interpretation of the tenor solos, and Mr. Beckett elicited much applause by his vigorous singing of the music allotted to the Giant, Polyphemus. The second part was miscellaneous. Miss Barker at the piano, and Mr. Barlow at the American organ, rendered efficient assistance, and Mr. Doxey, the teacher of the class, conducted most ably throughout.

LEICESTER.—The members of the Leicester Choral Society signalled the close of their sixth season by the production on Tuesday evening, March 29, at the Temperance Hall, of Handel's Oratorio, Israel in Egypt, in a manner which showed how well they had profited by the training of their excellent Conductor, Mr. C. Hancock. The difficult choruses were excellently rendered, and the solo vocalists—Mrs. Osgood, Miss Askew, Madame Enriquez, and Mr. Vernon Rigby—were highly efficient. The interpolated song, "He layeth the beams of his chambers in the water," which unfortunately breaks the narration and the chain of choruses, was sung by Mr. R. C. Allen, and received with much applause; and the duet, "The Lord is a man of war," was effectively sung by Messrs. Allen and Greatorex. The new organ, though as yet far from complete, under the hands of Dr. Keeton, added materially to the general effect; and Mr. Hancock conducted the performance with his usual ability.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD.—A successful Concert was given here on the 19th ult. in the Town Hall, by Mr. T. J. Price, who had secured the services of Miss Hebe Barlow, Miss Mary Horton, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Egbert Roberts, and Mr. Victor Buziau. The singing of the several vocalists, and the violin playing of M. Buziau were greatly appreciated, while Mr. Price, a local favourite well sustained his reputation.

LIVERPOOL.—The annual Tea-Party and Concert, in connection with St. David's Church, took place on Thursday evening, the 7th ult. The chair was taken by T. B. Roydon, Esq., J.P. The artists were Miss Annie Williams, Miss Gracie Jones, Miss Roberts, Mr. Wynne, Mr. Raymond, Mr. Evans, &c., and a select choir, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Arvon Parry; accompanist, Miss Maggie Evans. The performance, on the whole, was very creditable. On Wednesday evening, the 20th ult., the lay clerks from Chester Cathedral gave a Concert in Hope Hall, in aid of the funds of St. Jude's Church. They were assisted by Miss Adela Vernon (vocalist), and Mons. Veerman (solo violin), the Rev. C. Hylton Stewart, Precentor of Chester Cathedral, acting as accompanist. Miss Vernon sang with much effect, and Mr. E. Robinson, Mr. Kemp, and Mr. Stewart, were also very successful.

MACCLESFIELD.—On Wednesday evening, the 20th ult., the final rehearsal of Romberg's Lay of the Bell, with full band and chorus, took place at Parkside Asylum. At the conclusion of the rehearsal Dr. Deas in a very able address spoke of the valuable work which Mr. Hawkins, as Musical Conductor, had done since his connection with the institution, and to mark the appreciation of his efforts, presented him, on behalf of the principal officers and choir, with a handsome conductor's bâton, silver mounted and inclosed in a morocco case, which bore the following inscription: "Presented to C. Hawkins, Esq., by the members of the choir and band of Parkside Asylum, Macclesfield, April 21, 1881." Mr. Hawkins replied in suitable terms, expressing his thanks for the gift. On the 21st ult., the same Cantata was performed before a numerous audience. The orchestra was composed of the members of the Asylum band assisted by several local amateurs. Organist, Mr. Coates; Conductor, Mr. Hawkins. The solo parts were ably sustained by Miss Jackson, Miss Robson, Mrs. Coates, Dr. Deas, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Partington, and Mr. Young. The rendering of the Cantata was a complete success. A miscellaneous programme followed, in which the Misses Henderson and Mr. Seal were the vocalists.

MAIDSTONE.—On Good Friday the Service announced to take place at Holy Trinity Church was attended by an immense congregation. Upon the entry of the choir and clergy, the congregation rose, and the service commenced by the singing of a Hymn. The effect of the singing of the choir of ninety voices with orchestra was very striking. The Rev. T. Moore gave a short address, bearing upon the "Story of the Cross," which was followed by Beethoven's Mount of Olives. For attack, precision, and true appreciation of the intention of the composer, it would be difficult to surpass the rendering of the various numbers. The solo parts were very ably sung by Mrs. Heniker, Mrs. Hobday, Mr. Crowe, and Mr. Robinson. The choir of Holy Trinity was assisted by members of St. Paul's, St. Faith's, St. Philip's, East Farleigh, Teston, and Lenham Church choirs, and the Maidstone Choral Society. The orchestra played with great care. Mr. Duttall presided at the organ, and Mr. H. F. Heniker, A.R.A. Mus., conducted.

MELBOURNE, DERBYSHIRE.—The Glee and Madrigal Society gave a very successful Concert in aid of the funds of the Children's Hospital, Derby, on Tuesday, the 5th ult. Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm, Brahms's Hungarian Dances for pianoforte (four hands), Handel's violin Sonata in A (finely played by Mr. W. S. Woodward, R.A.M., who kindly gave his services on this occasion), part-songs by Macfarren and Benedict, and works by Haydn, Grenzabach, Hauser, Costa, &c., were included in the programme. The sum of £10 was cleared, after paying all expenses, and will be handed over to the Charity.

MONTROSE.—Handel's Messiah was given in the Guildhall on Tuesday evening, the 12th ult., by the Montrose Harmonic Union. The rehearsal was a private one, being solely for the honorary members and their friends. Besides the Conductor, the soloists were Misses Christie, P. Law, and Annie Law, Messrs. Nicol, Clement, and Wyllie.

The choruses were well sung, and the accompanists, Miss Taylor (pianoforte) and Mr. Hall (harmonium) thoroughly efficient. The performance reflected credit on the Conductor, Mr. C. B. Taylor. At the close, Bailie Hutcheon proposed a vote of thanks to the Union, which was heartily awarded.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—The Town Hall was completely filled on the 8th ult., at the invitation Concert given by Mr. T. Albion Alderson's Choir. This is the third season of the existence of the choir, and the compositions produced on the occasion showed, not only that the association has a good president, but also, that the members themselves are good executants. The works were Henry Gadsby's Cantata, the Lord of the Isles, and Henry Smart's Cantata, the Fisher Maidens, preceded by Pinsuti's chorus, "We'll gaily sing and play" (containing the air, "The last rose of summer"), and followed by a chorus from Cowen's Rose Maiden. Mr. Gadsby's Cantata contains a number of choruses, the best of which were, "Sing the brook of burning gold," "Merrily, merrily, bounds the bark," and "The sun gleamed low." The soloists were Mrs. W. F. Whatford, Miss Alice Lewis, Mr. T. H. Armstrong, Mr. Robert Armstrong, Mr. William Catchside, and Mr. Alfred Brown, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. It shows the strength of the Society when the members (who are all amateurs) were able to furnish a new set of artists for a second work the same evening, the characters in the Fisher Maidens being sustained by Mrs. W. F. Whatford, Miss S. East, Miss M. East, and Miss A. Lewis. The Conductor, Mr. Alderson, performed upon the organ the Overture to the Lord of the Isles, and afterwards played, with his accustomed good taste and feeling, the pianoforte accompaniment.—On Good Friday evening a special Service was held in St. Andrew's Church, when the Rev. W. B. East read the prayers, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Rogers, M.A., Precentor, Durham, who spoke of the power of music for affecting the feelings of men, and of its wonderful capacity for expressing the emotions of the human mind. He illustrated this from various points of view by examples from history, and pointed out that the study and art of sacred music always accompanied the great movements in religious thought. He spoke strongly in favour of the re-introduction of the oratorio or sacred cantata into the church, and pointed out the high spiritual effects that this would have upon the minds of devout worshippers. Haydn's Passion Music was then sung with great feeling and effect by the St. Andrew's choir, augmented by members of Mr. T. A. Alderson's amateur choir. The organ was presided over by Mr. Alderson. The congregation, which was large, evinced the deepest interest throughout.—On Good Friday Handel's Passion of Christ was given, for the first time in Newcastle, by the Salem Church Choir, assisted by several friends, under the direction of the Organist, Mr. W. S. Foggins.

NORWICH.—The fourth season of the Saturday Popular Concerts was brought to a successful close on Saturday, the 2nd ult., the proceeds of the performance being given as a testimonial to the zealous Hon. Sec. (Mr. H. D. Abbott), who has done so much in Norwich towards popularising music among the working classes. The programme was very attractive. The generous and genial Deputy Mayor (H. Bullard, Esq.) presided, and the committee are indebted to him for defraying the cost of the principal items. Two bands shared the instrumental portion, viz., the Carrow Works' Band, belonging to Messrs. J. and J. Colman, and the Norwich Orchestral Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. Walter Tuddenham, who also played a violin Concerto with much effect. The vocalists were Miss Florence Norman, R.A.M., who created a most favourable impression upon the audience, Mdle. de Stopelliere, and Mr. J. H. Brockbank, of Norwich Cathedral.

OTTAWA.—The first meeting of the Brookville Philharmonic and Ottawa Choral Societies took place in the Opera House on March 22, before a large audience. Selections from the Messiah constituted the first part of the programme, and, when it is remembered that the two Societies never had a rehearsal together, the result may be considered satisfactory. The orchestra, consisting of about twenty instruments, mostly strings, was highly effective. Miss Torrington and Miss Rogers gave their solos with much success; and Mr. Coates, in "Why do the nations?" created a favourable impression. In the second part, Mendelssohn's unfinished Opera, Lorelei, and Berthold Tours's quartet, "Winter and Summer," were welcome items, the latter composition being enthusiastically encored. Mention also must be made of Schumann's "Gipsy Life," which was well rendered. The singing of the choir in "Land, ho" (Leslie) and Mr. Oliver King's beautiful little composition, a "Cradle song," which he wrote specially for this Society, was so highly appreciated by the critical audience present that both pieces had to be repeated. At the conclusion of the "Cradle song," there were loud cries for the talented young composer, who modestly bowed his acknowledgments. In Bishop's glee, "Now tramp," the soprano solo was so well sung by Miss Brannin as to elicit loud and deserved applause. Mr. Harrison deserves much credit for the excellent manner in which he conducted the Concert, which was in every respect highly successful.—The last Lecture of the season, in connection with the Ottawa Literary and Scientific Society, was given in their rooms, Sparks Street, on March 25, by Mr. J. W. F. Harrison, Musical Director of the Ottawa Ladies' College, the subject being "Ancient Music." The hall was well filled by an attentive audience. The lecture was made doubly interesting by the introduction of diagrams and musical illustrations, in the latter of which the lecturer was aided by Mrs. Harrison and Miss Kemp, of the College.—Mr. Oliver King's first Pianoforte Recital, on the 5th ult., in St. James's Hall, was attended by an attentive and appreciative audience, a large majority, we should judge, attracted by possibly one of the most interesting programmes of pianoforte music ever offered for the enjoyment of a Canadian audience. Mr. King's technique has been so highly spoken of that it is unnecessary to describe that feature of his performance, nor his capacity for playing a lengthy programme, altogether without note, but we hardly think that full justice has yet been done to Mr. King's powers of interpretation. Those who fancied a delicate rendering of the "Lieder" inconsistent with the power necessary to interpret Liszt, must have been agreeably surprised at Mr. King's graceful playing of the three "Lieder," the third familiar to many as that performed at the composer's funeral. The "Andante and Rondo Capriccioso," by the same composer, Chopin's "Berceuse," and Liszt's two pictorial "Studies," and "Hungarian Rhapsody" (No. 2), were all masterpieces of execution, and most warmly applauded. The opportunities the audience have had, although unhappily too few, of hearing Mr. King's interpretation of the modern masters, enabled them to listen with a pleasure, and certainly with an intelligent appreciation, which would have been wanting before his advent, to the works of Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, and Brahms.

PAISLEY, N.B.—Mr. J. Barratt, Mus. Bac., Oxon., gave a Concert in the Good Templars' Hall on Friday evening, the 8th ult. The solo singers announced were Miss Adela Vernon, Miss Damian, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Signor Foli; but owing to indisposition the two ladies above-mentioned could not appear, and their places were supplied by Miss Alice Parry and Madame Osborne Williams. All the vocalists were highly effective, many encores being enthusiastically demanded. The bénéficiaire, who is Organist of the Abbey, presided at the piano, and played the accompaniments with much skill and judgment.

PETERBOROUGH.—On the 5th ult. a performance of Farmer's Oratorio, Christ and His Soldiers, was given at the Trinity Congregational Chapel. The principal vocalists were Miss Duddington, Miss Brawn, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Grice, all of whom were thoroughly satisfactory. The Conductor, Mr. W. J. Claypole, although young, exhibited remarkable powers of direction and control. Mr. Ruddell presided efficiently at the Organ, and the work was most creditably rendered throughout.

PORT GLASGOW.—The Newark Musical Association gave a Concert of sacred and secular music in the Town Hall on March 30. Those pieces which were most creditably sung were, "Behold, how good and joyful," "From all that dwell" (encored), "From Oberon in Fairyland," "Come where lovely springing flowers," and "Green grow the rushes" (also encored). The soloists were Miss Cowan, Miss J. Cowan, Messrs. Chalmers, Charles, and Guy. Mr. Midgley presided at the piano.—The second Concert of the Choral Union was given on the 18th ult. in the Town Hall, when Handel's Oratorio, the Messiah, was performed. The choruses throughout received a very careful rendering, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Paterson Cross. The soloists were Mrs. Smith, Miss Edith Ross, Mr. James Boyd, and Mr. Steel. There was a good orchestra; Mr. C. B. Midgley presided at the harmonium.

READING.—On Wednesday evening, the 20th ult., an open Rehearsal was given by the All Saints' Ladies' Musical Society, conducted by Mr. J. C. B. Tirbitt. In addition to songs and part-songs, Smart's Cantata, King René's Daughter, was performed by the ladies of the Society, all the numbers of this musically work being rendered most expressively and carefully throughout. In the miscellaneous part of the programme the ladies were assisted by the Revs. A. C. Daymond and H. S. Miles, and Mr. Tirbitt, the Hon. Sec., Hon. Treasurer, and Conductor of the Society. A large and appreciative audience was admitted by subscribers' tickets.—On Thursday evening, the 21st ult., a Ballad Concert was given in the Town Hall, for which the following artists were engaged: Miss Mary Davies, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Bernard Lane, Mr. Farley Sinkins, Miss Randegger (solo pianoforte), and M. Albert (solo violoncello and Conductor). The Concert was in every respect thoroughly successful.

ST. BEES, CUMBERLAND.—Mr. Alf. H. Digby, Organist of the Abbey Church, gave his second Organ Recital on Easter Monday to a large and appreciative congregation with great success. The organ, built by Hills and Son, possesses solo stops of remarkable purity and roundness of tone. These Recitals are highly valuable as a means of raising the musical tone and culture of the surrounding district. The proceeds of the collection, which was a large one, were devoted to the benefit of the widow of the late organist of St. James's, Whitehaven.

SOUTHGATE.—The seventh Dedication Festival of St. Michael's, Bowes Park, was celebrated on Thursday, the 21st ult., including Holy Communion at 11, and full Choral Evensong at 7.30. The latter service was sung by the Rev. Geo. Bennett, of Christ's Hospital, and an appropriate sermon followed by the Rev. Jas. Jeakes, Rector of Hornsey. The solo portion of the anthem (Elvey's "Wherewithal shall a young man") was given with much effect by Mr. Geo. Micklewood, of All Saints', Margaret Street; and the choir, numbering in all forty voices, sang throughout the Service with ease and precision. Mr. Henry J. Baker presided at the organ.

STOCKPORT.—Mr. T. B. Birch's seventh annual Pupils' Concert took place on March 25, when a varied programme, including several instrumental solos, was gone through with much satisfaction to the audience.

TETBURY.—Mr. Charles Joseph Frost, Mus. Bac., Cantab., of London, gave an Organ Recital in the Parish Church on the 20th ult., the programme including compositions by Bach, Merkel, Widor, Mendelssohn, Frost, Turpin, &c.

TWICKESBURY.—The following programme was given by Mr. Charles Joseph Frost, of London, at an Organ Recital, in the Abbey Church, on the 21st ult.: Fugue in G (Krebs), Elegy in B flat minor (E. Silas), "O Sanctissima," variations (F. Lux), March in B flat (C. J. Frost), a. Offertoire in E flat, b. Cantilene in A minor (Salome), Allegro Maestoso in F, Flute Concerto (Rink), Fantasia in E minor, "The Storm" (Lemmens), Overture in F (Morandi).

TODMORDEN.—On the 11th ult., in the Town Hall, the Musical Society gave its last Concert of the season. The first part consisted of Dr. Roberts's sacred Cantata, Zionah, which was conducted by the composer, and the second part was miscellaneous, Mr. T. Law being the Conductor. The principal vocalists were Miss Ashworth, Mrs. Suthers, Mrs. Mitton, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. A. Lord. There was a full band and chorus of 120 performers. The Cantata was listened to by a critical assembly, and gave great satisfaction, Dr. Roberts being most warmly applauded by both orchestra and audience.

WELLINGBOROUGH.—On Good Friday evening a sacred Concert was given in the Congregational Church to a very large audience. Costa's March from Eli, Root's Cantata Daniel, and a selection from Handel's Messiah were performed. The band and chorus numbered eighty performers. Mr. A. T. Patenall led the band, Miss Marriott presided at the organ, and Mr. W. J. Lamb, the Organist of the church, conducted. The "Hallelujah" chorus was especially well rendered, and several of the solos were redemanded.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The third of the Festival Choral Society's subscription Concerts took place at the Agricultural Hall on Monday evening, March 28. There was a full band and chorus of 250 performers, and the principal vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. John H. Blower. The first piece in the programme was Smart's Bride of Dunkerron. The brief orchestral introduction was well played by the band, but there was a little unevenness in the opening chorus of Sea-maidens and Serfs, especially amongst the male voices. The solos by Miss Marriott and Mr. Lloyd were finely given; and Mr. Blower gave a very fair rendering of the part of the Sea-king. Sir Michael Costa's fine Offertorium, Date sonitum, and Haydn's Spring were the other works performed. Mr. Stockley conducted.

WORTHING.—Two Concerts were given by the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society in Montague Hall, on the 20th and 21st ult. The programme on the first evening was devoted to Costa's Eli, the solos in which were excellently rendered by Miss Robertson, Miss De Fonblanque, Madame Jenny Pratt, Mr. Redfern Hollins, Mr. J. H. Blower, and Mr. John Bridson. Evidence of the good training the choir had undergone was afforded in the admirable manner in which the choruses were sung, and the performance throughout gave general satisfaction. On the following evening a miscellaneous Concert was given, the vocalists being Miss De Fonblanque and Madame Jenny Pratt. The orchestra consisted of the principal instrumentalists engaged on the previous night. Mr. Palmer conducted, Mr. Willing presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Eayres led. A flute solo was contributed by Mr. W. L. Barrett, Messrs. Burfield and Willing performed a duo concertante for clarinet and pianoforte in a highly efficient manner, and a violin solo by Mr. Eayres, a contra bass solo by Mr. A. C. White, and a piccolo solo by Mr. Barrett were also accorded a flattering reception. The Concerts were of a very excellent character, and were sustained throughout in a manner redounding to the credit of the performers. On each evening the hall was well filled by an appreciative audience, and it is to be hoped that the necessarily heavy expenses incurred were met by the support accorded the two days' festival—a festival which stands out as the greatest achievement which has yet resulted from the efforts of the Worthing Sacred Harmonic Society.

YORK.—A performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music was given on the 8th ult. with unqualified success. The solo vocalists, Miss Tomlinson, Miss Brookes, and Mr. Blagbro, were highly effective; and the choruses were sung with remarkable precision, and due attention to the expression of the text.—Handel's Messiah was given on Good Friday by the York Musical Society in the great hall of the Yorkshire Exhibition. The chorus and band were not large, but with the organ, combined with the voices and instruments, a fairly good representation of the concerted numbers was presented. Mr. Padell was Conductor.—Herr Padell's Concert took place on Wednesday, the 20th ult., in the De Grey Rooms. The principal vocalists were Miss Amy Aylward (soprano), Mr. Arthur Jarratt (baritone), and Mr. R. E. Miles (bass). The principal item of the programme was Hofmann's Fair Melusina, which was well received by the audience. The chorus, numbering over fifty voices, were well balanced, and they were thoroughly en rapport with their Conductor, Herr Padell. The second half of the programme comprised a miscellaneous selection of songs and instrumental music.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Boddington Smith, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Stephen's, Hampstead.—Mr. A. Godwin Fowles, F.C.O., to St. Bartholomew's Church, Southsea.—Mr. George Coomber to the Parish Church, Portsmouth.—Mr. F. C. Atkinson, Mus. Bac., Cantab., to Norwich Cathedral.—Mr. James H. Rooks, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's Church, Manningham.—Mr. J. M. Falslaw, Organist and Choirmaster to Esher Parish Church.—Mr. W. S. Woods, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Grappenhall, Warrington.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.'S MUSIC PRIMERS

A DICTIONARY

MUSICAL TERMS

BY

DR. STAINER AND W. A. BARRETT

(Compressed from the Imperial 8vo Edition by K. M. ROSS).

One Shilling; paper boards, 1s. 6d.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A careful and judicious abridgment of the larger work, and will be found useful by those to whom the original is inaccessible."—Athenæum.

"A most serviceable abridgment of Stainer and Barrett's well-known Dictionary. Few, if any, words that the student can wish explained are absent from this little volume, which should be in every amateur's library."—Daily Telegraph.

"Of even more general utility is 'Musical Terms.' As a dictionary of reference this little volume should be on the table or shelf of every musician."—Graphic.

"Most of the special information contained in the large volume has been reproduced in this shilling pamphlet, the compression having been judiciously made by Mr. K. M. Ross."—Illustrated London News.

"In its condensed form the work contains a mass of information which is rarely to be met with in books of the class. It is particularly copious in German terms, which are now becoming of nearly as much use as the Italian."—British Mail.

"The musical learner will find much useful information on the principles of music and on many technicalities of the art only to be found in high-priced productions."—Perthshire Advertiser.

"No individual with any pretensions to a musical taste should be without this excellent book of reference."—Perth Citizen.

BRISTOL.

MR. J. HAMILTON,
6, CHESTERTON TERRACE, CITY ROAD,
MANUFACTURER OF

Pedals and Action for Pianofortes,

Begs to inform Organists, Organ Students, and others that his invention for attaching PEDALS to PIANOFORTES is so useful that it has earned the approbation of over a thousand members of the musical profession. For a small outlay the great pleasure of playing organ music (from Bach's Grand Fugues to the late Henry Smart's beautiful movements) at home can be obtained. This action is easily attached to any kind of Pianoforte in a short time, as it is all sent complete with printed instructions "How to attach."

A Set of Straight Pedals (CC to F, 30 notes), with action and printed instructions, price £4 4s.

TESTIMONIAL.

Brinscall, near Chorley, February 4, 1881.

Sir,—I received the pedals and action yesterday, and have got it attached to my pianoforte. I must say that its utility and usefulness exceed all my expectations, it is perfectly noiseless and just what every organist or any one wishing for pedal practice at home ought to have. I should have had a set of your pedals years ago had I known they acted so well.—I remain, yours most truly,

J. AINSWORTH, Professor of Music.

To Mr. J. HAMILTON.

Agents are required for every town and district.

Send for prices to the profession and trade; also for testimonials. Orders accompanied with cheque or P.O. order will receive immediate attention.

Address, J. HAMILTON, 6, Chesterton Terrace, City Road, Bristol.

MESSRS. KELLY and CO. beg to announce they will offer for Sale by Public Auction, at their Mart, 16, Mortimer Street, London, W., the Important and Valuable Property as above, on WEDNESDAY, May 4, 1881, commencing at 1 o'clock precisely. Goods may be viewed the day prior and morning of Sale. Catalogues free.

TO ORGANISTS and AMATEURS.—Messrs.

KELLY and Co., of 16, Mortimer Street, London, W., have on hand several very fine Organ Harmoniums with all the modern improvements, rendering them suitable for organ teaching and practice, and which Messrs. Kelly and Co. are enabled to offer for much less than half the original cost. One is by ALEXANDRE, in dark oak case, with 2 manuals (swell and great), percussion action, 2½ octaves of bourdon pedals, 24 stops, of which 12 are speaking, 2 combinations, 2 couplers, "full organ," &c., crescendo swell, and knee composition pedals, seat, side-blower, &c. Another is by TRAYER, in rich walnut case, 2 manuals, 22 stops (15 speaking, 2 combination), swell, knee movements, coupler, &c. Also various others similar to the above, in oak, solid walnut, and black and gold cases, with 22, 19, 14 stops, &c., &c., and many others much smaller in size and price. An inspection is respectfully solicited.

FOR SALE (Ipswich Sacred Choral Society), the entire LIBRARY belonging to the above Society. For particulars, apply, Mr. A. T. Baxter, 28, Falcon Street, Ipswich.

FINE C ORGAN for SALE, by private treaty, comprising Great Organ, compass CC to F, stopped and open diapason wood, open diapason metal, stopped diapason, principal, twelfth, fifteenth, sesquialtera, trumpet; Swell, C to F, double diapason, open and stopped diapason, principal, trumpet, and oboe; Choir, CC to F, dulciana, stopped diapason, principal, flute, 4-ft. cremona, 2½ octaves C pedals; Couplers, swell to great, swell to choir, great to pedals, choir to pedals. For price, &c., apply to Mr. Thomas Delch, Wheatland Lane, Seacombe, Birkenhead.

ORGAN, three-manual instrument, independent pedal, solid oak case, for SALE, or may be HIRED. For particulars and trial apply to Mr. Davies, Grand Pump Room Library, Bath.

ORGAN of 2 Manuals, CC to G, 56 notes of 11 stops, with bourdons, German pedals (30 keys); in stained case; decorated front. Price £120. Apply to Costloe and Son, Isleworth, Middlesex.

CHAMBER ORGAN for SALE, by WALKER and SON. 2 manuals, 17 stops, 5 composition pedals, nearly 700 pipes. Price £120; cost, £220. Apply, A. Z., 10, Lancaster Road, St. Norwood Park.

CHAMBER ORGAN for SALE.—Great organ, open CC to G, dulciana C to G, stopped diapason CC to G, flute CC to G; swell organ, keraulophon CC to G, gemshorn CC to G, oboe CC to G, separate pedal bourdons, 29 notes, walnut case. Apply to A. Hunter's Organ Factory, 379, Kennington Road.

DAWES' PATENT MELODY ORGAN or HARMONIUM, built by J. and P. SCHIDMAYER, Stuttgart. 18 stops, percussion action, pedal substitute, two knee-swells, elegant walnut case. Cost 90 guineas; is in every respect equal to new, and will be sold for £55. Address, 2, Kingston Grove, Woodhouse, Leeds.

GRAND ORGAN-HARMONIUM (ALEXANDRE, PERE ET FILS), 2 manuals, pedals, 30 stops, 13 compass sets of reeds, percussion action, Venetian swells, couplers, &c. Cost £250; £125, or offer. Can be tried at Cathcart Villa, 1, Cathcart Hill, Junction Road, Holloway, N.

FOR SALE, a CHAMBER ORGAN. 2 Manuals of 56 notes; pedals of 30 notes and 20 stops. Built by Mr. HUGHES, Albany Street, N.W., 1880.

This instrument is quite new and most admirably suited to a private house, as the whole of the pipes are inclosed in 2 swell boxes, fitted with double sets of shutters, which, when closed, produce the most delicate soft effects, and when opened a grand crescendo is produced unobtainable in most chamber instruments of the same size. The space occupied is exceedingly small considering the number of 8-ft. stops, i.e., 3 ft. 8 in. deep, 6 ft. 8 in. wide, 11 feet 3 in. high. There is a large bellows, with 2 feeders and a foot blower inside the organ; but to insure steadiness of wind there have been added 2 reservoirs with 4 feeders for placing in a room beneath. These are connected with the bellows inside the organ by a wind trunk passing through the floor. The latter, when full, closes a valve which shuts off the supply of wind and so feeds itself. The desk and key fittings are of polished oak, and the case is of pine, stained and varnished, with sliding panels for gaining ready access to the interior. The Vox Humana is from Henri Zimmermann, Paris; the wind pressure, 3 inches.

"There can be no doubt but that we owe most of what is good in the chanting of to-day to the (seven years') labour and care bestowed on the first edition of this work issued in 1856."—Musical Standard, September 25, 1875.

"Taken as a whole, Dr. Elvey's work has not been surpassed. . . . We believe that educated musicians generally—with a sense of the importance of this part of worship—if they must chant from such a pointed psalter, would prefer Dr. Elvey's conscientious framework to any other we know."—The Orchestra, January, 1878.
